With Peter Pixis there died the last of a family of artists who had been famous during three generations. His father, Friedrich Wilhelm Pixis, was organist at the Reformed Church, Mannheim, in which capacity, as well as in that of a composer for the organ and the piano, he was favourably known. But he was far surpassed in talent by his two sons. Of these, the elder, Friedrich Wilhelm, born in 1786, was a distinguished violinist, and died, in 1842, as Professor of the Violin at the Prague Conservatory. Johann Peter, the younger son, was born at Mannheim, in 1788, and, like his elder brother, created a sensation while still a child. As far back as 1796, the two brothers, then aged respectively ten and eight, appeared as infant prodigies at Mannheim, subsequently visiting Carlsruhe and Stuttgart. At all these places they excited great and unanimous enthusiasm. After 1797, they made long professional tours through Germany, and continued to do so till 1804, invariably meeting with applause and other marks of hearty approbation. On their return, Friedrich Wilhelm entered the orchestra at Mannheim. Johann Peter devoted himself to the earnest study of composition, publishing now-and-then a few small pieces. In 1810, he went to reside, as a music master, at Munich, and afterwards at Frankfort. In the year 1816, he had, by two new professional tours, made his name known as a piano-virtuoso half-over Europe. In Germany he was considered to occupy one of the first places in this branch of art. His playing was very brilliant and elegant. He was a thorough drawing-room performer, inventing and overcoming difficulties which, at that epoch, were regarded as well nigh insurmountable. The period of his greatest celebrity lay between 1820 and 1830. In the former year he settled at Vienna, where he was the rival of Hummel and Moscheles for popular favour. Among his acquaintances was Beethoven. In 1826, he went to Paris. There, too, he was accounted one of the first pianists of the day, and competed with Kalkbrenner and Herz as he had previously competed with Hummel and Moscheles.

He had now reached, however, the highest point of his fame as a virtuoso. When Thalberg, Chopin, and Liszt appeared, his performances were thrown into the background, and he was sensible enough to retire in time. But he composed with redoubled zeal. He wrote some 150 works, including Concertos, Trios, and Fantasias, besides numerous Variations and Rondos, which in his day were much played. He composed, also, an opera: Bibiana, oder die Kapelle im Walde, but it was not successful. At present, his compositions are not generally known.

He was once more induced to come before the public, and make an artistic tour through the principal cities of Europe, by the talent of Francilla Pixis, who, as a singer, added fresh lustre to his family name. The young lady's own name was originally Göhringer, and she was born at Baden in 1816. Pixis was struck, when she was still a child, with her undoubted talent and magnificent voice. With the consent of her parents, he adopted her, and, taking her with him to Paris, had her taught singing. She achieved, as a vocalist, under the name of Pixis, a high reputation, first in the French capital and then in Italy, subsequently confirming it in Germany also. Pixis exerted himself to the utmost to advance Francilla in her profession, but she retired into private life on marrying, in Italy, the Marquis Minofrio.

Meanwhile, Theodor Pixis, a son of Pixis' brother, Friedrich Wilhelm, in Prague, had grown up, and worthily followed his father's footsteps in art. Peter Pixis took his nephew with him to Paris, and developed his talent as a violinist. On his return to Germany, Theodor, though still very young, obtained an honourable post in Cologne, but was prematurely snatched away in the summer of 1856.

Thus was Peter Pixis once more alone. In 1840, he fixed his head quarters in Baden, where he remained till his death, at first giving lessons and occasionally playing in public, until the increasing debility of age compelled him gradually to seek entire repose. He suffered for years from defective hearing, which at last culminated in total deafness. Up till then, however, though nearly seventy, he eagerly attended every concert and operatic performance, judging everything with the utmost freedom from aught like prejudice, and doing full justice to the art of a period which was not his own.

In the latter years of his life, he profited by his solitude to commit to paper his reminiscences, rich in descriptions of persons and events. These reminiscences will probably be published by a nephew of his resident in Prague.

Peter Pixis reached an age seldom attained by an artist. He witnessed the entire artistic career of Beethoven, Weber, Cherubini, Spontini, Rossini, Auber, Meyerbeer, and many others, all of whom preceded him to the grave. More than this, he was a contemporary of Mozart; and, till within a few short months, formed a living link between the present generation and the immortal composer of Don Juan.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN AT MILAN.

LAST year Mr Arthur Sullivan received a flattering letter from Cav. Mazzucato, director of the Royal Conservatory in Milan, containing a pressing invitation to visit that city, and produce there some of his compositions. Mr Sullivan was unable to accept this invitation at the time; but last month he went to Milan, and was received in the most cordial and flattering manner. We extract the following account, written by the justly celebrated critic of the Perseveranza:—

"Colle due esercitazioni di lunedì e di ieri sera il Conservatorio ha compito l'esposizione finale dei profitti fatti dagli allievi ed allieve nei singoli rami dell'esecuzione e della composizione. Nella prossima Appendice faremo qualche osservazione su questi risultati. Per oggi constatiamo l'esito pienissimo anche delle due ultime Accademie, e specialmente del violinista De Angelis, che ha suonato il difficile concerto di Mendelssohn con bella larghezza di stile e sicurezza inappuntabile d'intonazione. Sempre applaudita la Falce del Catalani ed il Perdono del Maggi. Il robusto lavoro del Catalani fu molto lodato ed ammirato da una grande autorità musicale, Arturo Sullivan, il primo dei compositori inglesi viventi. Quantunque giovanissimo, il Sullivan percorse di già una carriera brillantissima. Studiò a Lipsia, ed è ora in Inghilterra il fortunato continuatore delle splendide tradizioni di Handel e di Mendelssohn. Il Sullivan compose oratorii, opere, sinfonie, musica da camera in quantità, e celebratissime illustrazioni orchestrali della Tempesta e del Mercante di Venezia di Shakespeare. Il suo oratorio The Light of the World ottenne un immenso successo nel grande Festival di Birmingham nell'agosto del 1873. Prima di lasciare Milano, il compositore inglese fece i suoi rallegramenti al direttore del Conservatorio per l'ordinamento e pei frutti dell'educazione artistica. Fece poi dono all' Instituto di alcune sue composizioni, le quali verranno eseguite nelle esercitazioni degli allievi; e la Commissione artistica della nostra Società del Quartetto speriamo vorrà ammetterne qualcheduna nei suoi programmi sinfonici. Ieri fu diramata la seguente circolare, che riproduciamo colla massima soddisfazione:—

"'Signore,—Gli allievi e le allieve del R. Conservatorio di Musica hanno l'onore d' invitare la S. V. e famiglia alla Mattinata musicale del giorno 25 corrente agosto, ch' essi intendono di offrire all' illustrissimo signor Presidente ed al chiarissimo signor Direttore dello stesso Istituto in attestato di profunda stima e di affetto riconoscente. La Mattinata avrà principio alle ore 12 e la sala sarà aperta alle 11.

"'Milano 24 agosto, 1875.'"

"Questa piccola festa artistica è non solo un omaggio meritato allo zelo solerte del Presidente del Consiglio Accademico ed alle cure indefesse del Direttore, ma è anche una prova degli ottimi rapporti esistenti fra gli allievi e il capo dell' Instituto, che con tanto amore sorveglia la loro educazione. Sappiamo che fra i pezzi componenti il Programma della Mattinata vi saranno frammenti di sinfonie di Beethoven, il bellissimo Notturno del Sogno di una Notte d' Estate di Mendelssohn, e una ouverture scelta fra le opere liriche del Mazzucato." F.

Thus do country and country brothers in art. This should be no Utopia, but a direct way to the Millenium.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

We hear that Madame Arabella Goddard has accepted the offer of Messrs Strakosch to join the Tietjens concert-tour in the United States of America. Mdlle Tietjens has already started for New York. Let us wish her health, success, and a happy return to the country of her adoption.

It is said that Sir Michael Costa has taken with him to Florence the score of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, to study it intently. Sir Michael is a wonderfully clever man; but, if he can abridge Tristan without hurting it, he is little short of a miracle.

At one of the small capitals of Germany, the Prima Donna of the Hoftheater and the critic of the local paper were on very friendly terms. The critic, who was also a composer, one day paid the lady a visit, and smilingly said to her: "I am writing something for you, my dear Madame." "Not music, I hope," exclaimed the lady, taken off her guard.

When Richard Wagner visited the Prussian capital in 1871, he was asked his opinion of the three Royal Capellmeister resident there. He replied: "The first is naturally not unmusical, but he is too phlegmatic; the second is naturally not phlegmatic, but he is too unmusical; the third might have learned how to conduct—for he saw me conduct in Riga, thirty years ago—but he never has done so."

Messrs Potter, Odger, and others, may not be aware that the first strike on record dates very far back indeed, as far back as the times of ancient Rome. Such, however, is the case, on no less an authority than Livy himself. The immortal Paduan informs us that the Town-Pipers, or Town-Fifers, whose office it was to furnish the music at religious ceremonies, had enjoyed from time immemorial the right of banqueting in the temples, at the conclusion of the sacred rites. The Censors made an attempt to put down the custom. Hereupon, the indignant musicians resolved that they would all leave Rome. They instantly carried out their resolution by proceeding to the pleasant town of which Horace says—

"Tibur Argeo positum colono Sit meæ sedes utinam senectæ."

The priests found themselves in an embarrassing position. The Senate despatched messengers to Tibur, begging that the inhabitants would prevail on the recalcitrant musicians to return to their professional duties. But all attempts at persuasion proved useless, so the Tiburtini had recourse to stratagem. Profiting by the known partiality of their visitors for good liquor, the Tiburtini plied the fifers so well that the latter got gloriously fuddled, and in this state were sent back in carts to Rome. The Priests were so glad to recover the fugitives, that the latter were henceforth allowed to hold their banquets in the temples, and thus the strike was ended. This happened in the year 309 B.C.

With regard to Don Sebastiano, the following interesting and previously-unpublished letter, written by Donizetti, at Vienna, on the 8th February, 1845, recently appeared in the Gazetta di Bergamo:—

"My dear Friends,—I cannot yet give you any long details concerning the execution of Don Sebastiano, which was performed the other evening, but I may inform you that the opera was received more warmly than in Paris. Three numbers were repeated; the applause is still resounding in my ears. I was dragged upon the stage; I was obliged to show myself I do not know how many times, a circumstance with which I was not pleased. Believe me, my friends, they will alter their opinion in Paris about Don Sebastiano, for it is a work with which I took great pains, and which I consider a masterpiece. I do not like talking of myself, but I assure you I felt greatly grieved at the way in which your papers treated my opera, and which caused me to pass more than one sleepless night. I am, also, not pleased with the manager; he made me consent to some unhappy alterations; and M. Scribe might have helped me more than he did. But I will indulge in no more recriminations; in due time people will do justice to everything passably good in Don Sebastiano. The climate of Vienna does not agree with me; my head is no better, and, if things go on in this fashion, I shall be obliged to go and spend a few months at Bergamo, to recruit.

"Farewell, my dear friends. Do not despair about Don Sebastiano. If you were here you would be enchanted. Time avenges all injustice. I give you each a shake of the hand.

"DONIZETTI."

ADRIEN BOIELDIEU, whom the celebrated composer of Jean de Paris bequeathed to the world with his other creations, holds an opinion concerning his talents as a musician which differs greatly from that entertained on the same subject by the majority of his fellow-men. About the period of the recent Boïeldieu Centenary at Rouen, he called upon the manager of the Opéra-Comique, Paris, and, after a few preliminary observations, addressed him thus:—

"Monsieur Du Locle, do you not feel that the moment has arrived to honour worthily in the capital the memory of my illustrious father?"

"Certainly, Monsieur. I am already planning a magnificent performance, to be given some time in December next, in honour of his centenary."

"That is splendid; but do you not believe the best way to celebrate this glorious anniversary of a father, so justly celebrated, would be to play an opera of his son?"

"Eh?" said M. Du Locle, starting up from his arm chair.

"I say that certainly nothing would be more worthy of you, nor more agreeable to his spirit."

"But, my dear Monsieur," commenced M. Du Locle, quite embarrassed.

"I know what you are going to tell me!" cried Adrien. "I did not write the Dame Blanche!"

"Just so, but——however——your talent——your merit"——

"Ah!" continued Adrien, with tearful voice, "you cannot imagine how much wrong my poor father has done me!"

PROVINCIAL.

GLASGOW.—The Glasgow Choral Union have issued their prospectus. A series of nine concerts are to be given, fewer in number than last season, but intended to be equal in excellence. The Messiah, Israel in Egypt (conducted by Mr Lambeth), and Sir Michael Costa's Eli (to be conducted by the composer) are promised. Mr Arthur Sullivan is engaged to conduct the orchestral concerts, which are to be six in number, and are to commence on the 10th of November.

BRIGHTON.—At the Royal Aquarium concerts Miss Fanny Heywood has been singing, and Madame Pool, a charming vocalist, has appeared, and sang with great success Henry Smart's "The Lady of the Lea." The young sisters Agnes and Violet Molyneux were the pianists. Amongst the pieces they played were Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata (Mdlle Violet Molyneux) and Benedict's "The Flowers of Ireland," (Mdlle Agnes Molyneux). The other vocalist was Miss Palmer. At a special concert the Brighton Gazette informs us, the celebrated pianist, Miss Lillie Albrecht, played several solos to the delight of the large audience assembled. "Miss Albrecht's performances caused much astonishment, and were greatly applauded. Her style links her with the first artistes of the day, and is characterized by a sympathy with her melodies and expressive powers that must advance her to even greater popularity."

DUBLIN.—Never before has the large Concert Hall in the Exhibition Palace been so crowded as it was to greet the renowned cantatrice, Mdlle Tietjens, for the last time prior to her departure for America. She was warmly applauded after singing "Placida notte" and "Nella dolce trepidanza" (Balfe). In "Sull' aria," which she rendered with Mdlle Bauermeister, Mdlle Tietjens sang magnificently; nothing could have been finer. In the second part, Mdlle Tietjens gave "Kathleen Mavourneen" charmingly; and "The Last Rose of Summer" was, as it always is, unique. "As the last notes died away"—writes a Dublin admirer of the great artist—"we asked ourselves, how long shall we have to wait to hear this unrivalled songstress again?" After repeated and enthusiastic demands for an "encore," "Home, Sweet Home," was touchingly sung by the fair Teuton. "We wish Mdlle Tietjens a safe journey, every happiness on her way, and, above all, a speedy return to her old Dublin friends." Signor Brignoli is a superb tenor; his "Good bye, sweetheart" and the serenade in Don Pasquale were capitally sung. We do not think Signor Brignoli has ever appeared to so great advantage upon his former visits. The quality of his voice always reminds us of that prince of tenors, Mario; his style and the whole management of his voice bespeak Signor Brignoli one of the most finished singers of his school. Signor Foli sang "The Shadow of the Cross" and "The Diver," and, for an encore, gave "The Stirrup Cup." Upon the whole, it was a grand concert; three great artists (Tietjens, Foli, and Brignoli) all in good form, and Mdlle Tietjens as fine as ever.

BRISTOL.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The concert given at Bristol by Mdme Patti, on the 15th inst., was a great and brilliant success—so crowded was the hall, that the seats usually allotted to the choir had to be given up to the public. The opening piece, the well-known duet in Belisario, was splendidly rendered by Signor Urio (tenor) and Signor Caravoglia (baritone). The latter also sang a ballad by Louisa Grey, "Thee and I," with great taste. Mdme Castellan then followed with a brilliant execution of 'Une fantaisie de Faust,' for the violin, and Mdme Patti sang the air, 'Una voce,' from Il Barbiere, receiving an enthusiastic encore. A solo for the pianoforte was played by the composer, Mr Kuhe, with his accustomed taste and brilliancy; after which, Handel's aria, 'Rend il sereno,' was sung by Signor Urio, with great purity and tenderness of feeling; indeed, it is long since we have listened to a tenor with a voice of such compass and, at the same time, so rich and powerful, tender and sympathetic. Mr Kuhe opened the second part of the concert with one of his popular pieces, and, being encored, substituted another of equal merit. Signor Urio next sang Balfe's serenade, 'Good night, beloved,' as finely as we ever remember to have heard it, and in response to a vociferous encore, gave, to the delight of the audience, 'La Donna è Mobile.' An attempt was made to encore this, but Signor Urio simply bowed his acknowledgments. Mdme Patti sang the Shadow Air from Dinorah, 'Ombre leggiera,' which was encored, the fair artist substituting 'The Last Rose of Summer'; Signor Caravoglia gave, with great dash and humour, Rossini's 'Tarantella,' and, on being called upon to repeat it, gave 'Largo al factotum,' in which he was equally successful. Mdme Patti terminated the concert with the ballad, 'Kathleen Mavourneen'; and the incomparable 'Diva' made her final exit amidst a round of English cheers. "M. B."

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I send you a copy of a law passed by the State of New York, at the suggestion of the Mutual Musical Protection Society, together with the by-laws of the society—the members of which consist of every grade of musician, both vocal and instrumental, numbering several hundreds, all over the Union. As many of our musicians are continually leaving the United Kingdom, it is well they should see how matters stand in America as to musical affairs.—I am, &c.

WELLINGTON GUERNSEY.

[The commencement of the paper forwarded to us with the above letter, from our esteemed contributor, appears in another column. The paper will be continued weekly.—J. V. B. (ED.)]

DRESDEN.—The operas performed at the Theatre Royal during the month of August were: Der Freischütz, once; Die Meistersinger, twice; La Muette, once; Czaar und Zimmermann, once; Robert le Diable, twice; Die Folkunger, once; Amelia, by Verdi, once; Le Nozze di Figaro, once; Le Prophète, once; La Dame Blanche, once; Preciosa, once; Il Trovatore, once; Das Glöckchen des Eremiten, three times; Der König hat's gesagt, once; and Templer und Jüdin, once. As we see, there was no want of variety.

VIENNA.—A short time since, Robert le Diable was performed at the Imperial Operahouse, the principal characters being sustained by Mesdes Wilt, Dillner, Herren Rokitansky, Labatt, and Schlittenheim. Everything went off very well up to the scene in the churchyard. At the commencement of this scene, a general movement was visible on the stage, and the ranks of the Terpsichorean ghosts were thrown into disorder. Herr Rokitansky hurried to the right-hand side of the stage, and a cry of: "Oh! my foot! my foot!" was distinctly audible. The audience, excited by this unusual state of things, rose from their places, and gazed anxiously at the stage. Suddenly the curtain fell, but it was raised again almost immediately, and the performance proceeded in the ordinary manner. Not till afterwards did the public learn the cause of all the commotion, which latter was due to the fact that a member of the corps de ballet, owing to her own carelessness, got her foot caught in the trap down which the grave-clothes of the unearthly dancers disappear. This accounted for the cry: "Oh! my foot! my foot!"

Dear Sir

Altho I have not had the pleasure of making your personal acquaintance you will perhaps consider our occasional relations of collaborateurs in the prep a sufficient excuse for the liberty I take in addressing this letter to you especially when its purport is regarded -

My wish is to introduce to your notice and acquaintance an accomplished and amiable artist, Madame Guadagni, the celebrated Contralto of the San Carlo who is, as you know, engaged for the season at the N. I. Opera and as she will arrive in our overgrown Metropolis an absolute stranger she has requested me to put her in rapport with some persons who are more especially interested in her Art - I know none so capable of appreciating her talents as yourself nor any more likely to enjoy the exercise of them and it is for that reason that I feel the less scruple in taking the liberty of addressing this letter to you -

I remain, Dear Sir,
Yours very truly

MATTERS OPERATIC IN ITALY.*

Immediately a German opera comes to be performed in Italy (by the way, it is almost exclusively Der Freischütz which has hitherto been selected to represent German art there on the stage), the event is followed by complaints of the ill treatment to which the work has been subjected, which complaints are forthwith carried to Germany and find admission into all the papers. This was the case with a partial performance of Der Freischütz, some months since, at the Teatro Nuovo, Florence. German indignation and bile flowed in torrents on the occasion. But we should first look at home, and attack that class of singers, who, for a series of years have made it their business to pluck to pieces with the greatest indifference every separate part in this flower of C. M. von Weber's, or even, as though satiated and disgusted, to get through it as quickly as possible. Things, indeed, have reached such a pitch that this magnificent and thoroughly original work, which has achieved a really universal reputation, is regarded in the country of its birth, by managers, conductors, and sometimes by the public, also, as a stop-gap; as a standard for measuring the capacity of beginners; or, in extreme cases, as especially well suited to be suddenly put up on an evening when the manager is unable to give anything else. But, to return to our starting point, the unlucky performance of Der Freischütz at the Teatro Nuovo, Florence. Unfortunately, there is no law to protect the works of the great Dead from performances which are a profanation, and thus a theatre of thoroughly undeterminable rank, like this Teatro Nuovo—at which, by the way, every opera is turned, more or less, into a caricature—could not be prevented from laying hands on Weber's masterpiece.

Such unsatisfactory performances are, it is true, lamentable, but we must not take them too seriously, and, most especially, not treat them as a standard of the artistic capabilities of an entire country. The performances, for instance, of Der Freischütz, in Milan, in Rome, and in other towns of Italy, were perfect model performances. The principal parts were confided to eminent and first-class artists; the recitatives, composed by sterling masters, replaced most agreeably the prose, so fearfully ill-treated, as a rule, by German singers; and, lastly, the way the piece was placed on the stage was as intelligent as it was brilliant. In a word, Der Freischütz, which we in Germany, as already remarked, treat as belonging to the "Reserve," and which is never honoured by a place in the bills, except where "sudden indisposition" has rendered the piece previously announced an impossibility, was, in all the great theatres of Italy, prepared for representation with an amount of care and attention expended only on interesting novelties. It would have been more especially the duty of the Pergola, with its liberal subvention, to produce Weber's opera. The fact of its not fulfilling its duty is a sin of omission, but we cannot, and must not, make the whole of musical Italy responsible for it. To accuse the Italians of bestowing less attention on art-works of German origin than on those of other nations, would be utterly unjustifiable. Any one who has ever attended the admirable performances of the works of Beethoven, Haydn, Mendelssohn, and others, in the large concert-rooms of Italy—any one who remembers the care with which the attempt to introduce Richard Wagner's operas was made—any one, finally, who witnessed, a few weeks since, the performance of Heine's Ratcliff, at the Teatro Manzoni, Milan, would certainly never make such a charge. What a splendid combination was demanded by, and resulted from, this interesting event! Andrea Maffei gave us, in his translation, a real masterpiece; Belotti-Bon, the manager, ventured time and money in this dramatic essay; the celebrated Pia Marchi selected Ratcliff for her benefit; and Achille Torelli, the popular author of I Mariti, worked, with zeal and love, for weeks together, as though a child of his own muse were concerned, at the difficult task of putting this "Romanza drammatica" on the stage. In the course of one week, Ratcliff was performed four times, amid enthusiastic marks of approbation from numerous and select audiences. It was reserved for this freely-calumniated Italian public to demonstrate what has always been doubted, namely: the suitability of a great German poem for the stage, and, at the same time, to furnish a proof that works of art need not come direct from Mount Cenis in order to find a good reception in Italy, and that educated Italians, without prejudice or partiality, manifest the warmest interest in the intellectual achievements of all nations.

It will not, perhaps, be here uninteresting if, with a few strokes, we sketch a general picture of the thoroughly peculiar system in force at those moss-covered landmarks among the similar institutions of Europe, the Theatres of Italy, and, at the same time, give a glance at the tremendous demands made upon every one professionally connected with them.

The theatres in Italy are opened, as we know, by seasons. The season lasting from the end of December to Palm Sunday is the most important one. The autumn season and the Stagioni delle Fiere, as they are called, occupy a secondary position. Previously to one of the above-named seasons, the Committee, consisting of the proprietors, of the municipality, or of the occupants of the boxes, put the theatre up to public competition, knocking it down to that competitor (impresario, "a person undertaking any enterprise") who offers the best guarantees for carrying out the agreement between him and the Committee. He is assured a certain subvention, and binds himself to give a stipulated number of operatic and ballet performances. The caution money deposited by him is destined to meet any claims of the chorus and orchestra which may happen to remain unsatisfied; but the Directing Committee does not make itself in any way responsible for the punctual payment of the salaries due to the leading artists. The Impresario now enters on possession of the theatre. The little world of planks is desolate and bare. It has to be populated and fitted up. From the prima donna down to the last figurante, from the complicated ship in L'Africaine down to the pen with which Lucia di Lammermoor signs the marriage contract, the manager has to supply and to think of everything. Engagements are concluded with scene-painters, with stage-carpenters, and with one of the establishments, conducted in Italy on so large a scale, for theatrical costumes; recruits are beat up for the chorus and the band (few theatres have permanent bands); and lastly, steps are then taken for the engagement of the principal artists. The Impresario is frequently bound to secure certain artists especially designated by the Directing Committee; as a rule, however, he is left unfettered, the Committee simply reserving the right to revise the list of the proposed engagements.

Every one now sets to work. The silent region of the stage begins to grow animated. Each nook and corner teems with busy life. People are painting, carpentering, and hammering; the members of the chorus are studying their music; the supernumeraries are being trained; and the corps de ballet instructed, till, finally, a fortnight before the commencement of the season, the principal artists arrive. The prima donna comes from St. Petersburgh; the tenor from Buenos Ayres; the barytone from Cairo; and the bass from Spain. They do not know each other; they have never sung together, and they frequently are totally unacquainted with the music of the opera which is to inaugurate the season; yet, on the evening stipulated, the first performance must take place, if the manager would not incur by the delay losses which would jeopardize the entire season. Every one studies, therefore, with unlimited horse-power; rehearsals lasting from 12 to 3 in the afternoon, and from 8 in the evening to 2 o'clock the next morning, keep the entire company hard at it for a fortnight. At last, the opening night arrives. Eight o'clock strikes. The curtain goes up; a tempest of applause rolls through the house; the performance is successful down to the smallest detail; the Impresario rubs his hands for delight, while the singers are no less pleased at the successful result, which not only satisfies the artistic ambition of different individuals, but assures the financial prosperity of the whole season. Scarcely has the opening opera been performed two or three times, before a second is put in rehearsal. Again does every one work all day and on free evenings. It is true that there are not many of the latter, for the prima donna and the tenor are bound by their engagement to sing sixteen, and the barytone and bass, twenty or four-and-twenty times a month, the two latter artists having to take part in the performances given by what is called the second company. At length, the bills announce the last evening, the farewell performance. The artists shake hands, and wish each other "a prosperous journey." The season is over, and in a twinkling everything falls to pieces again. The scenery is quickly taken away; the "set pieces" are packed up; the fleshings and costumes find their way back to the magazines of their owner; and the stage, where, only a few hours previously, an opera by Meyerbeer, or a ballet by Taglioni, displayed all its splendours, remains till the next year the undisputed preserve of the theatre-cat on the look-out for rats. Immediately after the last performance, however, the steam-horse has conveyed the singers in all directions, and the same process re-commences for them in other theatres.

It may be, perhaps, remarked that this gigantic activity commands pecuniary remuneration far exceeding the salaries paid in Germany. Quite right. The pay of an Italian singer is, it is true, unusually high. The artist engaged at one theatre for several years can live on a regular, and, if he so chooses, an economical plan; his Italian colleague cannot do this, for the constant change of place renders his expenses all the year exceedingly heavy. "But what compels an artist to such wearing exertion, and why does he not allow himself more repose?" the reader may enquire. The answer is: Necessity. If anyone who had embraced the theatrical profession in Italy were to discharge his obligations with the nonchalance which has established its quarters in most of the Court Theatres of Germany, though he were to unite in himself all the qualities of a Rubini and of a Poggi, he would remain without an engagement, for an impresario expects from his performers not merely talent, but endurance and industry as well. Italian operatic singers who have acted in Germany have frequently told us that they had remarked with astonishment how little people in that country were acquainted with the proper way of employing the time and the resources at their command. They said, for instance, that an institution boasting of so numerous a company as the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, might easily produce a dozen novelties in different styles every year, only the artists would have to devote more than two fleeting hours of a morning to rehearsals, and, while getting up new operas, to cease paying homage to the maxim: Chi va piano, va sano.

Some time since, the Echo, attaching probably credence to some statement in the Italian papers, announced that Verdi was working at a "Funeral Symphony," to be performed on the occasion of Donizetti's earthly remains being removed to the basilica of Bergamo. Such is not the case. The Maestro was, it is true, requested to supply the musical portion of the ceremony, but he could not give a definite reply, as he was about to set out on the long journey, recently concluded, which took up all his time for some months. As we know, Verdi went to Paris and London, in order personally to conduct (in Paris for the second time) his Manzoni Requiem. How comes it that no one has thought of introducing a work of such acknowledged importance to Berlin, which is inundated during the winter season with such a flood of musical creations? S. E.

ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

At the weekly meeting of the council of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, held on Wednesday, the 22nd inst., Mr Henry E. Doyle in the chair, the following members being present:—Mr Thomas Maxwell Hutton, Mr T. A. Jones, P.R.H.A.; Dr Nedley, Mr R. Exham; and Sir F. Brady, Bart., and Mr H. Macdonnell, hon. secretaries—M. Alexandre Billet was appointed to the vacant professorship of the senior pianoforte class. M. Billet formerly held the appointment of professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatoire of Geneva, and is well known in London and Paris as a composer and pianist of distinguished merit. The council believe that the appointment of so eminent a professor will tend to the efficiency of the Academy, and will serve the interests of musical education in Dublin.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Förster, from the Burgtheater, Vienna, has been selected by the Municipality, from a large number of candidates, as Manager of the Stadttheater. He will enter on his functions next Easter—provided, by the way, that he can free himself from an engagement at present binding him to the Burgtheater, and it is not likely that the management of that institution will raise any objections.

WAIFS.

Mr Mapleson is not to accompany Mdlle Tietjens, as was generally reported.

Mr G. A. Osborne has returned from his tour in Italy.

Herr Schuberth has returned to town from his tour in Belgium and Germany.

Victor Hugo is writing a poem bearing the title of the Art of being a Grandfather.

On leaving Venice, after singing in Verdi's Requiem, Mad. Stolz gave 600f. to a local charity.

M. Doré's latest contribution to the gallery in Bond Street bearing his name is the picture exhibited in Paris this year, "The Hell of Liars."

Dr Bambridge, principal professor of music at Marlborough School, has appointed Mr Charles Davieson one of his assistant masters.

Basil Kouroskine, a Russian writer of some celebrity, who established the Spark, a satirical journal very similar to Punch, has just died.

On the conclusion of Mr J. S. Clarke's engagement at the Haymarket, a new and original comedy by Mr H. J. Byron will be produced.

The death is announced, within four days of his 90th birthday, of Mr George Johann Paul Fischer, Court painter to his late Majesty George IV.

Among the novelties to be produced at Mr Kuhe's Brighton Festival is an overture, composed expressly for the occasion by Mr G. A. Osborne.

It is stated that Mr Davenport, the American tragedian, will play Hamlet at the Grand Opera House, New York, in opposition to Mr Barry Sullivan.

Mr Benjamin Ginning some time since presented the poor of the city of Liverpool with £200. A good B. Ginning; let him continue in the same path.

The London Opera Comique will, on the 16th proximo, pass into the hands of Mr F. C. Burnand, who, it is said, will produce a new three-act comedy written by himself.

Messrs Lyon and Hall, of Warwick Mansion, Brighton, have made arrangements with the well-known "Illusionist," Dr Lynn, to give a series of his entertainments at the Pavilion.

The season at the Court Theatre will commence the first week in November, when the performance of Mr Hamilton Aidé's romantic drama of A Nine Days' Wonder will be resumed.

The King of the Belgians has conferred upon M. Le Chevalier Van Elewyck the cross of his Royal Order, as an acknowledgment of the Chevalier's services to musical art in Belgium.

Madame Vanzini leaves Liverpool for New York this day, in the Baltic, to fulfil her engagement with the Kellogg Opera Troupe. Madame Vanzini returns to England next spring.

A simple-minded specimen of the materfamilias class, having read in a poem about a simoom that "swept the plains," urged her husband to get one of them "new-fangled things," for her to use in her kitchen.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales honoured with their presence, on Wednesday evening, the performance of The Marriage of Figaro, by the Carl Rosa Opera Company, at the Princess's Theatre.

Wagner has obtained for his Bayreuth Tetralogical Trilogy the assistance of the greatest machinist of Berlin, to produce uncommon automatic effects, as several wild animals, including a dragon, are to appear moving on the stage.

In consequence of continued indisposition, Mrs Rousby will not return to America before next year. It is probable that on her recovery she will make her reappearance on the London stage in a new drama by Mr Dion Boucicault.

It is announced that Mr Isidor de Lara, of London, has been awarded the gold medal for composition, &c., at the Royal Conservatory, Milan. Mr de Lara is only seventeen years of age, and is the youngest candidate to whom the gold medal has yet fallen.

Among the artists already engaged for the Winter Concerts at the Crystal Palace are Mad. Lemmens, Mad. Sinico, Miss E. Wynne, Mad. Blanche Cole, Miss Rose Hersee, Mad. Patey, Mad. Neruda, Mr Sims Reeves, Mr Vernon Rigby, Signor Foli, and Mr Patey.

The death is recorded by the German papers of Henri Rückert, at the age of 52, son of the celebrated poet and orientalist, F. Rückert. Amongst the works published by the deceased historian may be mentioned Annals of German History, and History of the Middle Ages.

Sambo astonished a Kentucky postmaster a short time since by inquiring for "stamped antelopes."

Mr G. H. Betjeman's action against the Messrs Gatti (of the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts) has been settled by arbitration. Mr Betjeman has been awarded the whole of his claim and expenses.

Mr Tennyson's Queen Mary is to be produced on the stage in America immediately, in advance of London. It is announced to be played in Arch-street Theatre, Philadelphia, this week. A few additional scenes are to be introduced, and Cranmer is to be burnt on the stage.

The Philharmonic Theatre will re-open for the season on Saturday, October 2nd, under the direction of Mr Richard Temple, with Les Georgiennes (an opera-bouffe), by Offenbach, and a revival of The Zoo, by Arthur Sullivan. Miss Rose Bell is engaged for leading lady in Les Georgiennes.

In consequence of untoward accidents and delays in the completion of the scenery, which is understood to be of an elaborate character, Mrs Bateman was obliged to postpone the production of Macbeth till this evening. The event is anticipated with much eagerness by play-goers of all classes.

Signor Li Calsi has—according to La Gazetta Musicale di Milano, and other Italian journals—met with great success at Faenza, where he has been conducting Verdi's Forza del destino, and other grand operas. After each performance the accomplished maestro "è sempre fatto segno di ovazioni splendidissime."

Mdlle Albani, Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr Patey, Mr W. H. Cummings, Mr Radcliff, and M. Paque, are the artists engaged by Mr Kuhe (who will be the solo pianist on the occasion), for the second of his three "Dome" Subscription Concerts at Brighton. The concert is to take place on Monday. Messrs R. Potts and Co. have the "seating" arrangements.

Three brothers, natives of Cuba, who have been studying at Leipsic, where they are known as the "Coloured Trio," are about to visit England. Their names are Timénez, and they play the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello respectively. The "Cuban Brothers" appear to have astonished all who have heard them by their performances of classical music. They intend visiting England next month, in conjunction with a barytone singer of repute, Herr Schrauff, for the purpose of giving classical concerts in London and the provinces.

His Excellency Iwakura Tomomi, chief of the Japanese Embassy which visited England a few years ago, has just presented the library of the India Office with a set of the Chinese version of the Buddhist Scriptures, which weighs 3½ tons, and will require a room to itself. The India Library possesses already, besides many other Chinese works on Buddhism, a set of the Tibetan version of the Buddhist canon, in 334 large volumes, presented by Mr B. H. Hodgson, and a set of the Pali Tipitaka, written on palm leaves in the Burmese character, in 50 boxes, presented by Sir A. Phayre.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"THE MAIDEN'S TEAR."
SECOND RÊVERIE FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
Composed by LILLIE ALBRECHT.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.
"Miss Albrecht shows herself as clever a composer as she is a skilful performer, her Second Rêverie being a well designed, and excellently wrought-out Morceau de Salon, consisting of an introduction, melody, and variations. Considerable knowledge of the technicalities of the instrument is displayed in the writing, and the whole forms a most brilliant and effective solo. For scholastic purposes, as well as for public performances, the 'Maiden's Tear' will be found of great service." Sunday Times, January 10th, 1875.
"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht, Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, is a good and useful teaching piece, calculated only to justify its title in the case of the union of two such elements as incompetency in the pupil and irritation on the part of the master."—Morning Post, February 3rd, 1875.
"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. Brilliant and full of feeling, this Rêverie may take its rank with the best of Mr Sidney Smith's compositions."—Young Englishwoman, May, 1875.
"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. A carefully conceived and well studied composition; the composer is evidently a zealous student, and she has apparently much natural ability."—Hornet, April 28, 1875.
"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht. After the style of Brinley Richards, this drawing-room piece is brilliant without being difficult, and shows both talent and knowledge of the laws of musical composition on the part of the composer, who is, we believe, a very young lady."—The Drawing Room Gazette, June 19th, 1875.
"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. This charming piece evinces in its style throughout no small share of original talent, as well as sparkling and artistic cultivation, it being full of delicate and plaintive feeling. We have no doubt that it will be very popular, both in the concert-room and saloon."—Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, May, 1875.
"'The Maiden's Sigh' and 'The Maiden's Tear,' two reveries for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. These are both from the pen of a highly talented and proficient pianiste, and are of considerable merit. The first is a pretty little exercise, and the fingering is excellent; the second is far prettier, and as a morceau de salon has exceptional merit, whilst at the same time it is unconventional."—Public Opinion.

NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Sept. 23.

Although circumstances have been in some measure adverse to this, the 18th Triennial Festival of Norfolk and Norwich, it may, on the whole, be pronounced a fair success. The weather, as a rule, has certainly not been propitious. Nevertheless, at the first evening concert, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was given, at considerably reduced charges for admission, St Andrew's Hall was literally crowded by an eager and appreciative audience, the miscellaneous entertainment on the evening after being equally well attended.

Notwithstanding the disappointment caused by the withdrawal at the last moment of Mr Arthur Sullivan's anxiously expected David and Jonathan, and, consequently, the entire absence of novelty, the performances of sacred music have afforded a satisfaction easy to understand. The pieces were selected with unerring judgment; and their execution, in the majority of instances, was very nigh irreproachable. The members of the Norfolk and Norwich chorus fully maintained its repute, and Sir Julius Benedict has good reason to be pleased with the result of their endeavours, no insignificant share in which, by the way, must in fairness be attributed to Mr J. Harcourt, the indefatigable chorus-master, whose trained skill, not for the first time, has served him to excellent purpose. Particulars of the week's programme were set forth at length in a recent impression, and very few of its absolute promises remained unfulfilled. What was predicted of the orchestra has been thoroughly carried out; and this was apparent in the C minor symphony of Beethoven (which merely required an occasional touch of delicacy to silence criticism), at one concert, and the superb instrumental movements preceding, after the manner of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the choral portions of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, at the next. But there were further examples of spirited orchestral playing to which attention may be called hereafter. Let us first speak especially about the morning performances of sacred music. These, without reservation, were interesting in themselves, besides being noteworthy displays on the part of the executants. In the Lobgesang the vocal parts were no less remarkable than the instrumental. Rarely has this grand work of the most richly endowed composer since Beethoven created a deeper impression. To single out but one chorus from the rest, we may specify "The night is departing," perhaps, after "Thanks be to God," from Elijah, Mendelssohn's noblest and most elaborately wrought-out effort of the kind. The delivery of this was all that could be wished, and alone would have secured Wednesday's performance a marked place in the records of Norwich Festivals. The solo vocal parts were no less fortunate, Mdlle Emma Albani, who has been earning golden opinions this week, and whose successful début at the festival of 1872 is not yet forgotten, Mdlle Mathilda Enequist, and Mr Edward Lloyd were the chief singers, all distinguishing themselves and materially aiding the general effect. The tuneful duet, "I waited for the Lord," (Mdlles Albani and Enequist), was, at the instigation of the Mayor of Norwich, who in his choice showed taste and judgment not to be impeached, was repeated. At the beginning of the second part a similar compliment was paid to Mdlle Anna de Belocca, whose pure and unobtrusive rendering of Cherubini's well-known "Ave Maria" merited all praise. The graceful accompaniment for the solo clarionet was intrusted to Mr Lazarus, whose mellow tone and artistically-finished phrasing have seldom been displayed to more advantage—notwithstanding that the air, written, as amateurs need hardly be informed, for a soprano, was transposed a third lower, to suit the voice of Mdlle de Belocca, which is a contralto. The remainder of the programme was devoted partly to a group of pieces from the late Henry Hugh Pierson's oratorio, Jerusalem, composed expressly, as we have already stated, for the Norwich Festival of 1852, where it was first presented in its entirety. The selection, otherwise interesting, being somewhat deficient in variety, a certain sense of monotony resulted. Had Mr Pierson, once conspicuously prominent at the Norwich Festival, been living, he might have suggested one more effective, although, keenly sensitive to artistic symmetry, he would have preferred hearing his work as originally framed, instead of in fragments, the immediate relation of which one to another is not immediately apparent. The composer of Jerusalem, Hezekiah, and the music to the second part of Goethe's Faust, was of an uncompromising nature. He never wrote for gain, never for mere popularity. About what may have happened to him in reference to the first, knowing nothing, we are unable to speak; the last he never won. True, there are serious thought and serious purport in his music. Moreover, he was original, drawing from no other source than his own imagination, such as that was; but, unhappily, the source was arid, and though he evidently worked with the ardour and sincerity of one persuaded that he was by nature an artist who had a mission intrusted to him, he could only succeed in enlisting the sympathies of a certain zealous, even enthusiastic, coterie, failing to convince the outside world that he was endowed with gifts and qualities out of the common way. Nor are we at all surprised at this; on the contrary, we should have felt surprised had things taken another course. At the same time, Mr Pierson wrote with a firm belief that what he wrote was for the best, and that that for which he had striven was absolutely attained. This earnest sincerity has won consideration from many whose sympathies by his simple natural gifts and scholarly acquirements he could hardly have enlisted. Among the excerpts from his oratorio were the air, "Of the Rock that begat thee thou art mindful," which, expressive in itself, was expressively given by Mdme Sherrington; the air, "For a small moment have I forsaken Thee," one of the best-imagined and most carefully constructed solos in the work, extremely well sung by Mr Lloyd; the overture, a laboured, ambitious, and by no means unimpressive piece of workmanship; the trio, "Enter the Rock," for two sopranos and tenor, assigned to Mdme Sherrington, Mdlle Enequist, and Mr Guy; the air, with chorus, "And God shall wipe away all tears," solo by Mdme Sherrington; and the grand chorus, "The eternal God is thy refuge." Mdme Sherrington, who never sang with more feeling and refinement, was called upon to repeat the air above mentioned. The overture was admirably executed, and full justice was rendered to the choral portions; so that nothing was left undone by Sir Julius Benedict or by the singers and players under his watchful guidance to impart force and significance to that which the composer had endeavoured to convey by his music. The sensation produced, it must be confessed, was not a fair equivalent for the pains expended on getting up the performance. The whole, however, was a respectful and welcome tribute to the memory of an artist who once stood so high in the esteem of Norwich amateurs, and who is still so well remembered by Norwich people. After Jerusalem, music again seemed to move about with vigour unrestricted. What followed next, and brought the concert to an end, was Haydn's Third Mass, generally known as the "Imperial," the solo parts in which were allotted to Mdlle Enequist, Mdme Patey, Mr H. Guy, and Mr J. L. Wadmore. The performance of this work was excellent from first to last, and Mr Wadmore, a young baritone, who is rapidly making progress, won general approval by his singing in the "Qui tollis peccata mundi." The Mass was a spirited climax to a concert too long by at least a third of the music comprised in the programme.

Sept. 24.

It is to be regretted that the financial results of the 18th Norfolk and Norwich Festival are not very likely to realize the expectations of its well-wishers, or (unless donations come freely in) to leave any considerable surplus for the charities it is intended to aid. That the holding of the "Royal Commission" has acted prejudicially to its interests can hardly be denied. Moreover, the weather has been anything but propitious, and, under similar circumstances, Norwich has, perhaps, never been less buoyant and lively. Some persons go even so far as to predict that this will have been the last triennial meeting. Let us hope the contrary, for the sake of art and charity alike. The history of the Norwich Festivals reflects credit both on the city and county, and every amateur would regret to learn that they were to be abandoned. Nevertheless, with such a numerous and distinguished list of patrons ("vice-presidents," &c.), it is a pity that more of them were not actually present. This time, with a few marked exceptions, the Mayor and Corporation seem to have done the greatest part of the necessary work; and to them hearty thanks are due.

The programmes, for the most part, though attractive in their kind, have been lengthy almost beyond endurance. But this has long been a crying sin at Festival meetings, not only in Norwich, but in Birmingham and elsewhere. Every singer of note is expected to sing, not only once, but twice—frequently, indeed, thrice—more especially at the evening "miscellaneous" concerts, when the vocal music counts for almost everything. Take, for example, the first of the week—which began, by the way, with an orchestral symphony, produced in its integrity—the C minor of Beethoven. This grand work may be said to have "inaugurated" the occasion with a prophetic trumpet-flourish of success; and how much time is consumed in its performance no amateur need be told. It was welcome, nevertheless, as never fails to be the case if executed with spirit, force, and precision—as now, when Sir Julius Benedict and his band of instrumentalists seemed inspired. But, then, the polyphonic selection that followed was gathered, with unsparing hand, from all conceivable sources. Its undue length, at the same time, was its most censurable feature. Mdlle Albani and Mdlle Anna de Belocca took part in it, and both gave unmistakable pleasure to their hearers. The enthusiasm with which the young Canadian had been greeted at the Festival three years since still dwelt in the memory of the greater number present, and her reception was all she could have desired. Hearty, too, was the welcome accorded to the still younger Russian lady, who, but some months ago, was for the first time introduced among us. Mdlle de Belocca chose the familiar cavatina, "Di tanti palpiti," from Tancredi; Mdlle Albani selected "Qui la voce," from the Puritani, and "With verdure clad," from the Creation. Each, however, sang another piece, or other pieces later in the evening. We cannot describe this programme in detail; but we may mention that the Serenade and Triumphal March, for orchestra, from Mr F. H. Cowen's Joan of Arc, a cantata composed about three years past, for Mr W. Kuhe's well-known Brighton Festivals, brought the opening part of the entertainment to a close. The second part began with the overture to Guillaume Tell, and ended with that to the Nozze di Figaro; the former being encored, and the spirited final movement repeated. The remainder consisted exclusively of ballads and national airs, an enumeration of which, number by number, would be tedious and superfluous. Our own accomplished soprano, Mdme Lemmens Sherrington, and our own accomplished contralto, Mdme Patey, joined their Canadian and Russian sisters in these exhibitions of primeval art; Mdlle Enequist, the admired Swedish songstress, contributing two of the ballads of her country. Four nationalities were thus represented by the ladies alone. Signor Foli, Messrs E. Lloyd, H. Guy, and Wadmore were the other singers. We cannot but think that a concert of this character, made up of shreds and patches, is out of keeping with a great festival. Then, at the second morning concert, there was another long—much too long—selection. Spohr's cantata, "God, Thou art great," Rossini's Stabat Mater, and the late Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria were all comprised in the scheme.

The greatest impression at any morning performance during the week was created by the sacred masterpiece of our lamented English musician. The solo parts were entrusted to Mdlle Enequist, Mdme Patey, Messrs Lloyd and Wadmore—all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. Three pieces were encored and repeated—the air, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," the unaccompanied quartet, "God is a spirit," so conspicuous a feature at the funeral in Westminster Abbey, and "His salvation is nigh them that fear Him." The first was sung in perfection by Madame Patey; the second was undertaken by the four leading vocalists already named; the last by Mr Edward Lloyd. Each of these displays would have more than satisfied the composer. So, indeed, would the entire performance, which Sir Julius Benedict directed as carefully as if the cantata had been his own. The oftener the Woman of Samaria is heard, the deeper sympathy does it create. A work more symmetrical in form, more purely and chastely devotional, does not exist. It confers lasting honour upon our English school of music.

About Rossini's Stabat Mater, to say more than that its execution, despite flaws here and there, was generally effective, and that the solo parts were in the competent hands of Madame Sherrington, Mdlle de Belocca, Signor Foli, Messrs E. Lloyd and H. Guy, would be supererogatory. The duet for the two ladies was encored. Spohr's cantata, as has been already suggested, is not by any means one of the happiest "representative" works of its author. While strongly exhibiting his peculiar mannerisms, it reveals but few of those happy thoughts which have gained for him so high a place among composers of the actual century. Had "God, Thou art great" been omitted, it would have reduced the proportions and thereby increased the enjoyability of a selection already ample enough without it—a selection, by the way, which further included "Let the bright Seraphim," sung by Mdlle Albani, accompanied on the trumpet by Mr T. Harper, and encored. Of Sir Julius Benedict's St Cecilia—which at the evening performance was the counterpart of Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria at those in the morning, and had Mdlle Albani, Mdme Patey, Signor Foli, and Mr Edward Lloyd for solo vocalists—as also of Signor Randegger's Fridolin, the conspicuous feature of the last miscellaneous concert, we have a few words to say that must be deferred till another and a final letter. These cannot be dismissed with a bare reference to the circumstance of their having been given; nor can Mdlle Albani's expressive reading and perfect execution of the music of St Cecilia be passed over without some words explanatory of the unanimous approval she obtained. Meanwhile, it will suffice to add that the Messiah, the great sacred oratorio—oratorio of oratorios, indeed—brought the musical part of the Festival to a close. The chief artists, Mdlles Albani and De Belocca excepted, took part in the performance, which made the never-failing impression. The attendance was the largest of the week—that to Elijah on Monday night, when the prices were reduced, alone excepted.

The ball in St Andrew's hall, though attended by many personages of note, was, from a financial point of view, hardly so successful as on former occasions.—Times.

Sept. 25.

Whether Sir Julius Benedict took nine years to reconsider and perfect his cantata, The Legend of St Cecilia, before giving it to the world at the Festival of 1866, we cannot say, but that it has for "nine years" now braved public scrutiny, and come forth successfully from the ordeal, may be asserted with little fear of contradiction. St Cecilia is not only admired at Norwich, but in London and elsewhere. It is, in fact, while clear and simple in plan, one of the most finished and poetical things of its kind in conception and development, form and manner, that belong to contemporary art. In fashioning the legend for musical purposes the late Mr Henry Fothergill Chorley was more than usually careful; and Sir Julius Benedict has known how to appreciate the pains bestowed upon the work by his literary associate. It is unnecessary to describe once more in detail either the poem or the music. Enough that the triumph of 1866 found its counterpart at the Festival of 1875, and that St Cecilia again won unequivocal acceptance. From the opening prelude and "Wedding Chorus" to the canticle sung by Cecilia, alternately responded to and accompanied by the cheerful and consoling strains of her angelic deliverers, there was hardly a single passage that failed to make more or less sensible impression—the climax being, as a matter of course, the martyrdom of Cecilia and her converted lover Valerianus. Here the sympathies of the audience were expressed in enthusiastic plaudits, so unanimous and long persisted in, that it became indispensable to repeat it—a somewhat heavy tax upon the physical strength of Mdlle Albani, who, nevertheless, went through it vigorously. No wonder that, while a second demonstration as genuine as the first was going on, the composer warmly shook hands with his Cecilia; for never was task entered upon more heartily than that which had been accomplished by the young and fair Canadian, whose performance none present can readily forget. Sir Julius, indeed, was supported with equal talent and goodwill by all his interpreters, orchestra, chorus, and soloists—Mr Edward Lloyd (Valerianus), Signor Foli (the Prefect), and Madame Patey ("a Believer"), each rendering valuable service. Madame Patey gave the beautiful prayer of the Christian woman with such pure and touching sentiment that we felt no surprise at her being called upon to repeat it. The execution of St Cecilia, in short, was from first to last in the highest degree satisfactory.

Digitized by Google

At this miscellaneous concert was also heard Professor Macfarren's Liverpool "Festival Overture," and two movements from Sir Julius Benedict's new orchestral symphony. The overture, which improves on every hearing, and is really a fine work, was scarcely played in such a manner as to bring out its most characteristic passages with advantage. One of the movements from the symphony has already been made known—we mean the admirable scherzo. The other was a graceful andante. The final movement, which, it is believed, will be very elaborate, remains to be put on paper, and it would be unfair to pass judgment on a composition of such importance until its author has given it out complete. Both overture and symphony were cordially received. As if there had not been serious music enough in a programme so constituted, a dramatic scena by Signor Randegger, entitled Saffo, was introduced by Madame Sherrington, the composer himself conducting. The scena and the singing were worthy each other, but the lateness of the hour deprived them in a great measure of the consideration to which they were entitled. And then, how much more was to come! Mdlle de Belocca, who has been in high favour during the Festival, was set down for a romance from Mignon and an air from Le Nozze di Figaro, both of which she was invited by the audience (who at the secular performances use their own privilege as regards encores) to sing twice. There was also—besides other vocal pieces, solo and concerted, too many to specify—a promised selection from Mr J. Harcourt's operetta, The Science of Love (in which Mdlles Enequist and Helen d'Alton, Messrs Lloyd and Wadmore took the solo parts). Mr Harcourt's music, if not strikingly original, is so unassuming and so agreeably instrumented that, apart from its composer's immediate local position in regard to the Festival, it had a fair right to a place. Mr Harcourt himself directed the performance. Pity that it should have come on at so late an hour. The march from Wagner's Tannhäuser was the final number in a programme nearly one-third of which might have been omitted with advantage.

The entire first part of the last evening programme was, fortunately, devoted to Signor Randegger. Nothing preceded, nothing followed the dramatic cantata of Fridolin, originally produced under the composer's own direction at the Birmingham Festival of 1873. At Birmingham it was greeted with the warmth seldom denied to a new work of dramatic spirit and interest. This is precisely what Fridolin aimed at being, and certainly it has hit the mark. The cantata before all is dramatic, and points to the stage as its author's legitimate field of action. He might easily fit it for that arena with the help of certain modifications, the contrivance of which would not cost him much trouble. The incidents of Schiller's legend are tolerably familiar, and Mdme Rudersdorff has adhered to them with commendable fidelity in her adaptation of the poem. But we need not say over again in newly turned phrase what has already been written and published in relation to Signor Randegger's work. It suffices to add that at Norwich it pleased no less than it had pleased at Birmingham, and that the difference between the two performances was in no instance so palpable as might have been anticipated. This was admitted by not a few who had enjoyed the privilege of listening to both. All the numbers applauded at Birmingham were equally appreciated in St Andrew's Hall, none more so than the strikingly melodramatic scene at the forge. The lively chorus of "Hunters" and the chorus of "Handmaidens," which is as graceful as its predecessor is lively, were both encored and repeated. Signor Randegger was again fortunate with his solo singers—Madame Sherrington being the Countess Eglantine of Saverne, Mr Wadmore the Count, upon Signor Foli devolving the part of the wicked and designing Hubert, and upon Mr E. Lloyd that of the innocent Fridolin, which the composer, although Fridolin is a "page," has had the courage to assign to a man's voice instead of to a woman's, as so frequently happens under similar conditions. All did their best for the music, and succeeded accordingly. Not less zealous were the members of the chorus and orchestra; so that Signor Randegger had reason to be gratified. He was loudly cheered at the conclusion.

The promised Festival overture by Mr W. T. Best, of Liverpool, which opened the second part, is a spirited composition made up of an introduction and allegro, both carefully wrought out, but containing in the latter instance passages for stringed instruments not always very easy to execute with the effect contemplated. It is the work, however, of a genuine musician, and by amateurs will be esteemed as such. Not so well played as might have been wished, and evidently standing in need of more careful rehearsal than could have been allotted to it at so busy a time with so much else of importance to prepare, the overture will, doubtless, be heard again before long. It was favourably received. The remainder of the programme comprised a miscellaneous selection in which the principal singers took part, as on previous occasions, but which, though excellent in its way (and lengthy in proportion), demands no special comment. We must, nevertheless, suggest that some more important task should have been assigned to such an artist as M. Sainton than the accompaniment to an air from Le Pré aux Clercs, well as it was sure to be played by that eminent violinist, and brilliantly as the voice part was sure to be sung by Mdlle Enequist. Italian airs were given by Mdlles Albani and Belocca, and the whole came to an end with Auber's melodious prelude to La Sirène, shorn, by the way, of its opening movement. Thus terminated the Norfolk and Norwich Festival of 1875, not the last, it is hoped, to be held under the superintendence of Sir Julius Benedict; not the last, it is to be hoped, indeed, under any circumstances.

Miss Enriquez has requested us to state that the cause of her not appearing at the Norwich Festival, as announced, was simply "that the Committee were unable to carry out the contract as first arranged." The vacant place left by Miss Enriquez was filled up by the young and promising singer Miss Helen D'Alton, who did good service as second contralto in Elijah, &c.—Times.

The local papers furnish their readers with the subjoined estimate of the attendances at this Festival compared with those at the Festival of 1872:—

TURIN.—The Teatro Regio will open for the winter season under the management of Signor Daniele Borioli, who proposes giving L'Africaine, Mignon, and Sig. Lauro Rossi's new opera of Cleopatra.

BRUSSELS.—MM. Stoumon and Calabrési, the new managers of the Théâtre-Royal de la Monnaie, have been lucky at the commencement of their campaign, and, up to the present moment, have gained golden opinions from the operatic public, by whom their efforts, more especially as they affect comic opera, are favourably appreciated. Gounod's Mireille was a success, which is now followed by another, namely, Il Barbiere. The cast is, for this capital, very good. Mdlle Derivis, as Rosine, more than fulfills the expectations she excited as Mireille. Almaviva finds a worthy representative in M. Bertin. M. Morlet is an excellent Figaro; M. Neveu, a thoroughly artistic Don Basilio; and M. Chapuis, an exceptional Bartholo, vocally and histrionically. Il Trovatore, also, has been produced with success.

THE KENNEDYS IN AMERICA.

Now you must excuse all this long prosing, but my apology must be that I know you to be interested in all matters musical. To return to our travels. We had a nice drive from San Jose, in a street-car, down to Santa Clara, through a continuous avenue of densest shade-trees—one of the most unique trips we have had. The whole road was lined on both sides by the most delightful villas, half concealed by rich foliage, and the track stretched away in front through a delicious sylvan vista, broken here and there by patches of sunlight. Santa Clara is an old Spanish settlement. One hundred years ago, the fat monks used to sit in the "plazza" and watch the interesting sports of "bear-baiting" and bull-fighting. Now, the practical Jonathan has flooded the place with his saloons and groceries, and replaced the old memories and old sports by as near an approach to a verdant Paradise as it is possible to get in a town of any size. From here we went to Stockton, where we gave our concerts in the "Mozart Hall" (composers' names are much in vogue as titles for halls). Next door to it, however, was the "Mozart Liquor Saloon," an appellation which seems somewhat irreverent. At Sacramento we had our "Twa Hours at Hame" in the Congregational church, which might sound as an act of sacrilege to not a few decent people in the "old land;" but it is used constantly as a public hall for respectable entertainments, lectures, and meetings. The Americans have not, like us, the same hallowing respect for mere buildings. There is not the same line sharply marking the difference between things sacred and secular; they are blended more; there is no great gulf between Sunday and Monday. This is symbolized by the clergyman discarding gown and bands, and appearing in ordinary mortal suit, with neat black or coloured tie, and, may-hap, a white waistcoat. This jarred against our old notions at first, but the absence of stiffness and formality is very grateful now. Sacramento is the capital of California, though nothing to be compared, as a town, with San Francisco, and has a very imposing capitol, like the same building at Washington, though smaller.

From here we started on our long overland railway journey on the great Pacific line. We were two days and two nights on the way to Salt Lake, and enjoyed the luxury of "sleeping-cars." The grand scenery of the Sierra Nevada mountains was passed over in the night, so we lost the chance of seeing the noble landscapes in the full light of day; but the moon rose and lighted up the pine-clad valleys in a way that probably intensified their grandeur and gloom. What height, what depth, what unfathomable darkness away down in some of the great cañons, and then what a vast expanse of wide mountain-slopes when the train rushed round on the edge of a precipice, at an elevation of 5,000, 6,000, and, at the "summit," 7,000 feet. When we got in to the snow-sheds, those long wooden tunnels, all prospect was lost, and in the morning we awoke upon the great alkali desert, a plain covered with dusty-looking sage-brush, and bounded by distant mountain ranges. Every seven or eight miles we came to a little wayside station, where every poor soul about the place came out to see the long train—a strange group of human beings, composed of rough diggers, saloon loafers, "niggers," Chinamen, and red men. The noble Indian, with his long black hair, and face something like a Chinaman's, was dressed in European clothes and round hat, while the little boys and girls scampered about in whatever rags were handy. The women looked lazy, and sat on the platform on their hunkers, looking up for any stray crust the passengers might throw out during their lunch. Some of the females had their "papooses," or babies, swaddled on boards, tied behind their backs. So on we went through weary plains till we came to Humboldt Station, where we passed through the "Palisades," the first bit of scenery we had seen for hours—a long winding defile, with huge, rugged cliffs running along on either side, as if you were travelling through the Queen's Park, Edinburgh, with the Salisbury Crags frowning down upon you on both hands. Shortly afterwards we were rattling down towards the Mormon capital, past Mormon farms and Mormon homesteads, and in view of the great Salt Lake. At length we beheld the city lying at the foot of the snow-capped Wasatch range, the houses all cosily sheltered by plantations, and above the trees rising the egg-shaped roof of the Tabernacle. A large building this, with the decorations of the "Jubilee" still remaining, and a cool fountain playing in the centre. On Sunday we heard the Mormon service. There was a large attendance of strangers. The organ is a noble instrument, and there is a capital choir. In front of them sat a large ecclesiastical orchestra of elders; and one of the "heads" of the church delivered a most virulent address. It is a dry, brutal religion, not only in itself, but in the stand it takes against all civilization and improvement. A day or two ago the Indians, under the instigation of the Mormons, attacked a small place called Corinne, but were repulsed. The inhabitants patrol their little township all night now. The followers of Brigham will have to shift soon, for the failure of the Mountain Meadows trial (because of a Mormon jury) is a great blow to the Latter-Day Saints.

In Sacramento we received copies of the Musical World; likewise, Mr Henderson, the slip-proofs of your article on the "Cedars," and the eloquent poem that accompanies it; also, "Jeanie Morrison," with your own music, and "My own loved land" (how we long to be there!), in which you are not only "author," but, we are delighted to add, "composer." The budget also contained further copies of your song on Dr Livingstone. Father will be happy to sing it. I was greatly pleased to see the programme of the "annual dinner" of your office, for not only did I see several familiar names, but it reminded me of a certain "wayzgoose" in Meopham (Kent), where I had the honour of being present, as the oldest apprentice in the office. Lastly, I was thunderstruck to see my last epistle to you printed in full in the columns of the Musical World—a shock from which my modesty is only slowly recovering.

From here we go to Chicago, Detroit, and Toronto, and down through Canada in the winter. My brother Robert has left our ranks for a little, and has gone "east" to make arrangements for our tour. He is imitating General Sherman in the successful rapidity of his march. Excuse this verbose letter, and the "nonpariel type" in which it is written. Now I must close, hoping that you are all in good health and that business is still as prosperous as ever. Will write again when we get into Canada, and hope to hear from you sometime or other. Kindest regards from us all to you all. I remain yours, very truly,

DAVID KENNEDY, JUN.

Too Late.

Sir,—While their is yet time to do some good, I should like with your permission to say a word about the Norwich Festival. I would principally address those that think the Festival a valuable institution, and urge them to take tickets at once, and not be satisfied that their neighbours and friends have taken theirs. I would then wish to touch the hearts of the Norfolk and Norwich public generally. The Festival helps to support noble charities; gives proof that the city has not lost its old vigour, but able to take a place amongst the cities of Europe; affords occasion for East Anglian hospitality; unites in stronger bonds county and city (desirable for both); engages citizens all the year round in studying the choruses of the great masters of musical art; and circulates large sums of money in our midst. Let every one consider that the future of the Festivals depends upon himself, and that by giving to wife and family an opportunity of hearing beautiful music, is doing more good than in sending direct to those institutions for the benefit of which the Festivals were instituted. Let Lynn, Yarmouth, and Norwich contribute liberally, lest the Festivals, which have done credit to Norwich for fifty years, be discontinued. All who enjoy a dance, and are happy in witnessing the happiness of others, should come to the ball and support those noble ladies who have given it their patronage. The ball has not been attended of late as it should be; and I fear if that to be given on Friday be not crowned with success, it may be the last in what has been happily termed by the press, the handsomest ball-room in the United Kingdom. There is more to be said in favour of Norwich Festivals. I may add that donations will be received from those unable to attend. By this means a large portion of the receipts of the Birmingham and other festivals are obtained.

FLORENCE.—The Teatro Pagliano opened for the season with Auber's Fils Prodigue, the principal parts being sustained by Signora Lorrini, Signori Vizzani, Brogi, and Silvestri. Verdi's Requiem was performed, under the direction of Sig. Faccio, on the occasion of the Michael Angelo Centenary.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

The Bohemian Girl belongs, as a matter of course, to the repertory of every English opera season. Its music may be hackneyed, and the time, labour, and money spent upon its production, may bring none of the reward which is higher and nobler than pecuniary success; but the public insist upon the work, and will take no denial. Mr Carl Rosa, therefore, had no choice when drawing up the scheme of his season but to include Balfe's familiar opera. It is easy to believe that, as a musician, he looked longingly upon things better adapted to strengthen the artistic repute of his enterprise, but, as a manager, he dared not neglect the Bohemian Girl. So the work was brought forward on Saturday night, in presence of a crowd every individual member of which, judging by appearances, had hungered and thirsted for the well-known tunes this many a day, and, having them, could not restrain enthusiasm. The theatre was crowded in every part, the cheaper seats especially being filled with a closely-packed and demonstrative throng. And yet there are people who tell us that English opera is played out, with nothing in its repertory but dead or exhausted music, and no public who care for it. Nonsense. Its repertory may not be strong, but that is a state of things which, unless the genius of music has entirely deserted our nation, can be remedied; while the aspect of the Princess's on Saturday night proved clearly enough that a public taste for English opera exists, and is ready to show itself whenever appealed to by a genuine attraction. The Bohemian Girl, true to a rôle it has often played, will be one of the chief supports of Mr Rosa's season, and materially help him to continue an effort on behalf of our national lyric stage such as every amateur regards with admiration for its spirit and best wishes for its success. But, even had Mr Rosa been under no sort of obligation to produce Balfe's work, he would have found an adequate excuse in his ability to give it with the additional music written for the version which had so favourable a "run" in Paris six years ago. English amateurs who lay claim to any sort of "higher development" in matters of taste are apt to speak sneeringly of the Bohemian Girl, and it may be well to remind them, by way of caution against a bad form of musical Philistinism, that this opera is something more than a favourite with our own mixed public. It is a cosmopolitan opera, and has found acceptance in many lands. It has been played at Hamburg, under the title of La Gitana; and at Vienna, under that of Die Zigeunerin. The Parisians know it as La Bohemienne; while all over the United States its original title is as familiar as among ourselves. Facts like these have a significance; and it was with no little interest that amateurs gathered to make acquaintance with the Parisian appendix. We are unable to say whether Mr Rosa played all the extra numbers. If so, their importance is less than, perhaps, was generally anticipated. The first act, for example, appeared strictly in its old form; while the second presented its first interpolation at the scene of the betrothal. Here the recitative and chorus, "Listen while I relate," is cut out, as far as the allegretto, "Happy and light of heart," to make room for an important ensemble, with solos, written in Balfe's most grandiloquent style: The new number, while effective per se, is a great improvement upon that displaced, because it gives adequate musical recognition to an episode which, dramatically, is of high significance. Its solos are chiefly for the Queen, and afford the representative of that character an excellent opportunity, of which, on Saturday, Miss Yorke took full advantage. Between the short chorus, "In the gipsy's life you read," and the duet, "This is my deed," a song for the Queen now appears, and is given in lieu of the latter. Having for its subject that musing upon the vanity of life which composers and poets so dearly love, and being written as much as possible like a dozen other ballads from the same hand, this interpolation requires no more than passing note; but the next, and last, addition is exceedingly pretty. We refer to a duet for the Queen and Arline, which comes before the gipsy march, and agreeably varies the flow of the music at that point. Balfe has seldom written, we will not say more fluently, because he is always fluent, but with more esprit than in this instance. The third act, like the first, has undergone no change, for the sufficient reason, perhaps, that, unlike the second, it invited none.

In various respects the performance deserved high praise. The orchestra especially carried off honours by its admirable execution, under Mr Rosa's bâton, and it is hardly too much to declare that Balfe's familiar music seemed another thing altogether thus rendered, than as it is too frequently heard. Rounds of applause followed the clarionet solo introducing "The heart bowed down," and that for violin at the beginning of Act 3. The principal characters were sustained, for the most part, in a manner too familiar for detail. Miss Rose Hersee, bright and fluent as ever, made Arline specially attractive; the fine voice of Miss Yorke did justice to the requirements of the Queen's music; Mr Nordblom sustained his repute as Thaddeus; Mr Lyall and Mr Aynsley Cook were amusing respectively as Devilshoof and Florestine, the one with refined, the other with broad humour; while Mr Celli, as the Count, obtained, in the instance of "The heart bowed down," a full recognition of his merits. The encores would take too long to enumerate, and he will not be far wrong who assumes that every favourite piece was redemanded. Mr Rosa has put the opera on his stage in liberal style. All the appointments are good, and it is long since our often dilapidated Bohemian Girl has made so brave a show.—Daily Telegraph.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Professor Macfarren delivered on Saturday an inaugural address at the Royal Academy of Music, of which he is the President. Among those present were Messrs G. Benson, F. R. Cox, T. A. Walworth, W. H. Holmes, A. O'Leary, F. Ralph, and W. Lacy. Professor Macfarren said that many memorable events had occurred since 1822, when the Academy was established at a meeting in the Thatched House in St. James's Street. The changes which had been made in the Academy had tended to increase the extent, and, he hoped, the usefulness of the institution in disseminating musical knowledge. The number of students on the list showed that it would soon be necessary to remove to other premises, but as yet the locality to which they might migrate had not been decided upon. Go where they might, however, the present site of the institution would for ever be notable in the history of music as having been the scene of many occurrences which had tended to the advancement of musicians. Referring to some of the musicians connected with the Academy, Prof. Macfarren spoke of the establishment, by Sir John Goss, of a scholarship in his honour, and bearing his name. Then there was Mrs Anderson, who had instructed the Queen; Thomas Attwood, whose talents had attracted the notice of the Prince Regent; Sir Henry Bishop, who had frequently given lessons in the Academy; Cooke or "Tom Cooke;" John Cramer, a representative man in the history of the pianoforte; Dr Crotch, the first member of the Academy, and famous as an infant prodigy; and Rivière. Pupils who had become famous were Sir Sterndale Bennett, William Harrison, Mrs Alfred Shaw, Charlotte Dolby, Henry Blagrove, and Charles Lucas. The relations between professors and pupils were most important and most sacred; it was the duty of the former to form not only the technical, but also the moral character of their pupils. Nothing in the teaching of the Academy would bear the name of perfunctory, although assertions to the contrary had been made. Pupils did not go there for amusement, but to be trained for a particular course in life. He hoped they were all actuated by seriousness of purpose. They were not to regard the study of music as for personal display. Like all other branches of art, music was holy, and should not be studied for the sake of eliciting admiration and momentary applause. Professor Macfarren then spoke of the principles of instruction adopted at the Academy, and insisted upon the imperative necessity of technical exercises. In sketching the course to be pursued during the session 1875-6, he referred to the various scholarships and prizes which were awarded by the Academy. Among them were the Westmorland Scholarship, the Potter Exhibition, the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship, the Parepa-Rosa Scholarship, and the Goldsmidt Scholarship. Professor W. H. Holmes proposed a vote of thanks to the Principal for his address. The vote was carried by acclamation.—Times.

MANNHEIM.—Herr Richard Wüerst's comic opera, A-ing-fo-hi, has been produced here very successfully.

CAPE TOWN.—An Italian operatic company, under the management of Sig. Caglio, will shortly visit this place.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

STANLEY BLIGHT.—The subject has been discussed over and over again in our columns. We really must decline to revive it.

ENQUIRER.—You would probably obtain all the information you want by writing to M. Victor C. Mahillon, the obliging and accomplished head of the well-known firm for musical instruments, Chaussée d'Anvers, No. 21, Brussels.

F. F.—Yes and No. "Glück" is decidedly German, and in so far you are right. But it signifies "good fortune, happiness." It is not the patronymic of the celebrated composer of Iphigenia in Aulis, who was named GLUCK—and in so far you are wrong.

ADUMBRATOR.—Our correspondent has clearly been bamboozled—just as another correspondent ("Indagator") was, but recently, by Dr Serpent, who appears bent upon wide-casting the apple of discord among inquirers. Gluck's Don Juan was a ballet, not an opera.

IMPOUNDER.—No. The sentence ran as follows:—"But upon this, and other matters connected with a festival which, for reasons unnecessary to impound, has not been so financially prosperous as many of its predecessors, we must speak in a general * * ." "Impounder" has been grievously misinstructed.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE concert season is again upon us, and Mr Manns, as usual, is first in the field. If other engagements have prevented us from noticing the Prospectus put forth a week or two since from the well-known Crystal Dome which crowns Sydenham Hill, it is not for want of the will so to do. For the Prospectus is emphatically a good Prospectus; good in quantity, good in quality; good in what it gives, and good in what it withholds. It is both curious and pleasant to look back—as the readers of the Musical World may, and, doubtless, will do—to the announcements which emanated from Sydenham in former years, and see what the progress has been in recent times. In those more ancient days the old Cantor of Leipsic was a rara avis at the Crystal Palace, but the name of John Sebastian Bach now regularly takes its place there, and this year is represented not only by a novelty at Sydenham—the sacred cantata, God's time is the best—but by an absolute novelty to English concert-rooms, which few but Mr Walter Broadwood, staunchest of flute players, can have heard (though he has, doubtless, not only heard, but played it)—the Suite in B minor, for orchestra and solo flute. HANDEL belongs of old to the Crystal Olympus; but he, too, comes forward with a new thunderbolt in his hand—the Chandos Te Deum, which has probably not been played or sung since its first performance in the chapel at Cannons. HAYDN, at once so great and so cheerful, has two appearances allotted him, and of these, again, one is a real novelty—a Symphony in E flat, known both as "Op. 59, No. 3," and as "No. 13," but seldom or never heard in the orchestra. Of MOZART, we are to have a welcome revival—the Requiem; also the Hafner Symphony, and the Concertante—which is as good as a symphony—for violin and viola, in E flat. Of BEETHOVEN Mr Manns may well say, "I give thee all—I can no more," when that "all" is the whole of the immortal nine Symphonies in their due succession. But he gives us more than "all"—"The Mount of Olives," a selection from the Ottet for wind, out of which the great composer afterwards made his stringed Quintet in E flat, and a selection from the Serenade for flute, violin, and viola, which, for more than one reason, might perhaps have been spared. Of SCHUBERT, the special household god of Sydenham, we are promised the "little" B flat Symphony (No. 5), which so charmed all hearers on its first performance on February 1st, 1873, and the "Grand Duo" for pianoforte, orchestrated by Joachim, doubtless, on Schumann's hint, who insisted on talking of it "as an orchestral work," and said, "take it in this light, and we are the richer by a symphony." So we are; and we are thankful for it, both to Joachim and Schumann—but most of all to Schubert. From Schubert the step is not far to MENDELSSOHN, and here we find only one Symphony—the beautiful youthful "No. XIII," miscalled "No. 1," which its author might have written to show how wide a gap there could be between it, beautiful and clever as it is, and his next, the Italian; also the Lobgesang; the Walpurgis Night; and the 95th Psalm, with the final MS. chorus of which we heard when the Psalm was done at Sydenham before. Of SCHUMANN, besides the Symphony in E flat (with Cologne Cathedral in the background), and the Overture, Scherzo, and Finale (or Symphony without an Andante), we are promised the "Rheinweinlied"—an overture containing a chorus,—and the "Introduction and Allegro for piano and orchestra" (Op. 134), neither of which has yet been heard by English concert-goers. Of WEBER, we welcome the overture to Peter Schmoll, and the "Rondo all' Ongarese," for bassoon, in which we shall be delighted to welcome Mr WOTTON too, as we shall welcome his confrère Mr CLINTON, in Spohr's 2nd Concerto for clarionet; and Mr WELLS, Mr DUBRUCQ, and Mr WENDLANDDT, each in something worthy of their talent, though not yet put down. And, for the sake of these truly admirable artists, we promise not to be wroth with Mr Manns for perpetuating the mistake of Power of Sound for Consecration of Sound in the title of SPOHR'S most favourite symphony (if not his best).

And now, before we leave the departed Immortals, and turn to their brethren still among us, let us speak of our dear, bright STERNDALE BENNETT. Knowing that he had left more than one symphony behind him in MS., we looked forward anxiously to the appearance in Mr Manns's announcement of some companion to the G minor, which has found its home at Sydenham. That hope has been disappointed (knowing the loyalty to Bennett which animates those who direct these concerts, we trust we may say "deferred"); but why do we see no mention of the "music to Ajax," the master's last work? That is surely accessible, and we hope and believe that means may yet be taken to remedy the omission, and give the public another opportunity of hearing a composition which will infallibly be more loved the more it is known. And, as we are talking of a great Englishman, let us go on to talk of his countrymen. We are truly glad to see Professor MACFARREN's noble oratorio down, and should like to see his Festival Overture down also. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT—Englishman in everything but the accident of his birth—is represented by the Andante and Finale of his second Symphony (in C), of which the allegro and scherzo were finely played at Sydenham last season. Let us have the whole work, Mr Manns. ARTHUR SULLIVAN is booked for a "Symphony in E." Is that our old friend, Arthur, or a new one in the same key?—it was so good that we should dearly like a second. JOHN FRANCIS BARNETT comes forward with a new Concerto for piano and orchestra, in which we hope to hear his clever sister, Emma Barnett. HENRY HOLMES promises a new Concerto for violin, played surely by no less inspired a bow than his own. EBENEZER PROUT, who might fairly write himself Proteus for the number of forms he can take, and whose Organ Concerto and Symphony won him golden opinions in previous years, has now written a Magnificat which is to make its first appeal to us here. WILLIAM CUSINS has reserved his overture to Love's Labour's Lost for the Sydenham orchestra, where, at any rate, his labour will not be lost; while Henry Hugo PIERSON's Macbeth, a "symphonic poem for orchestra," and new works by ALFRED HOLMES, HENRY GADSBY, and other English composers, wind up a goodly catalogue of English music, enough to furnish Mr Manns with, at least, one English number for each of his programmes, according to the excellent method which has now become his regular rule.

Hopes are held out that Messrs BRAHMS and RUBINSTEIN may be induced to come over and conduct or play some of their own works in person at Sydenham. Be it so; we shall be heartily glad to see them. But, meantime, whether they come or not, we are promised important works by each. By RUBINSTEIN, the Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, No. 8, and a Scena for soprano, also with orchestra; and by BRAHMS, a cantata, entitled Rinaldo, to Goethe's words, for solo tenor, male chorus, and orchestra—this a novelty—and repetitions of the Grosse Serenade, in D, and of the "Schicksalslied, or Song of Destiny," a remarkable work, for chorus and orchestra, which our readers will remember hearing last year. From BRAHMS to RAFF and VOLKMANN may seem to some a descent; but, nevertheless, both are strongly represented—RAFF by a "Mazurka, Polonaise, and Russich, for orchestra," and by his Symphony in G minor, not yet played in this country (Mr Manns apparently declining to follow the lead of the Philharmonic Society with the "Wald Sinfonie," in which, while we like his courage, we are not sure that he is wise), and VOLKMANN by an overture to Richard III. Of WAGNER we are to hear the Overtures to the Fliegende Holländer and Tannhäuser, and some extracts from Tristan und Isolde, which, if they please the audience as much as the introduction to the second act of Lohengrin, will please them very much indeed; while LISZT contributes a very characteristic composition, his "Mephisto Waltz," from Lenau's Faust (not Goethe's; though that would, probably, make no difference to the Abbé). In addition to the above, a "padding" is promised of new works by GOUNOD, VERDI, and AMBROISE THOMAS, and the old favourites (long may they remain so!) of ROSSINI, AUBER, CHERUBINI, &c., &c.

Such is the ample and appetizing bill of fare provided for our entertainment at Sydenham, in the seven months from October to April; and we will terminate this lengthened exposition of its contents by again expressing our satisfaction, and by further informing our readers that the programme of the opening concert, to-day, contains the Overtures to The Naiads (Bennett) and the Fliegende Holländer (Wagner); Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1; and Hégar's clever Concerto for violin and orchestra, played by Herr Wilhelmj, who first introduced it at the Albert Hall last season. The vocalists are Mdlle Cristino and Mr Edward Lloyd.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

WHO now ever hears any of the music of Herz or Pixis? And both are named in Mendelssohn's letters from Paris. Heinrich Heine, in the Augsberg Gazette, expresses a doubt whether Pixis really existed, or was anything more than an idea.

IN looking over the papers of a deceased client in a town of Pomerania, a lawyer is said to have discovered twenty-three manuscripts of the author of Don Giovanni, namely: several Symphonies, composed at Salzburg, Vienna, and Olmutz, and including one with the date: 1767, for two Violins, two Violas "d'amore," two Oboes, two Horns, and three Double Basses; a Concerto for Orchestra and Pianoforte (1774); and the instrumental accompaniments for the interludes (13th May, 1766) in a Latin comedy, entitled, Apollo et Hyacintha. We are afraid that the report is too good to be true.

SHORTLY after the conclusion of the Franco-German war, a Grenadier of the Prussian Guard visited, on his return to Berlin, one of the theatres. The play was The Merchant of Venice. The Grenadier listened with silent admiration until the point in the Trial Scene where Portia says:—

"And lawfully by this the Jew may claim
A pound of flesh."

On his hearing these words, his mind, full of the campaign of which he had so recently taken a part, involuntarily wandered back to that important item, his daily rations—for in German the word "Fleisch" means "meat" as well as "flesh." Still absorbed in the play, but thinking of the rations aforesaid, he exclaimed unconsciously: "And five cigars."

PROVINCIAL.

MALVERN.—The first of the series of fortnightly entertainments, to be held in the Lyttelton School Room during the coming winter, took place last week, when the room was well filled with a very respectable audience. Miss Whitnale and Mr A. M. Shepherd were the solo vocalists. Readings and recitations were given by Mr Melvin, Mr Corder, Mr Bettson, and Mr J. Jones, an address by Mr Jenkins, and glees and choruses were sung by Messrs Burston and Brown, and the members of the Templars' Lodge. Miss H. Jones presided at the pianoforte. The chair was occupied by Mr J. Bray.

HERNE BAY (KENT).—An evening concert was given in the Town Hall here, on Thursday, the 23rd ult., for the benefit of the Promenade Band, when there was a large attendance. The amateurs who assisted were Mdmes Safford and Guest, Miss Falkenberg, and Messrs Plant, Moulding, and Rhodes, of Canterbury Cathedral. A single professional artist—Mr Stedman—announced as coming from the "principal London concerts," assisted, and created an immense sensation by his lovely tenor voice and perfect style. The Promenade Band supplied the instrumental portion of the entertainment, which was perfectly successful.—S. W. J.

HASTINGS.—Miss Ada Lester, the youthful pianist, who so greatly delighted the audiences at the Pier Concerts by her charming performances during the past week, took her farewell of us on Saturday evening, the 25th ult., when she played Willie Pape's "Irish Diamonds" and Thalberg's "Dal tuo stellato," both of which she was unanimously called upon to repeat; but, as the fashion now is to disobey, not to obey, the young artist played Thalberg's "Home, Sweet Home," after the "Irish Diamonds," and Ascher's romance, "Alice," after "Dal tuo stellato." As young ladies must be in the fashion, we will not scold Miss Lester for following "l'ordre du jour," especially as she gave us two such charming pieces in place of the others, and, moreover, played them in perfection.

DUBLIN.—In our notice of Mdlle Tietjens' farewell concert in Dublin, want of space did not allow us to do justice to the singing of Mdlle Bauermeister, who gave the cavatina from I Puritani so well that she was recalled, when she favoured the audience with "'Twas within a mile of Edinboro' town." Signor Monari Rocca also quite satisfied his audience by his capital voice and good method of singing, especially in "Viva il matrimonio," and in the duet with Signor Foli, "Se flato in corpe anite," which was enthusiastically encored.—At the Gaiety Theatre Miss Emily Soldene has been performing in Geneviève de Brabant and in La Jolie Parfumeuse.

BRIGHTON.—Mr Kuhe's "Albani Concert" (the second of the three subscription concerts) took place, on Monday evening, in the Dome. Mdlle Albani was warmly received on her appearance on the platform, and, after her artistic singing of the scena from Lucia, the fair Albanian was twice "called" by her delighted audience, Mr Radcliff (who so finely played the flute obbligato part to the aria) being brought on to receive his well-merited share of applause. Mdlle Albani's second display was in the polacca from I Puritani, and, after being twice recalled, she gave "Robin Adair." Her other piece was "O Nanny, wilt thou gang wi' me?" and, on being encored, she gave "The Last Rose of Summer." Miss Edith Wynne and Mdme Patey were the other lady vocalists. Both being great favourites in Brighton, they were warmly received, and highly applauded after each of their performances. Mr W. H. Cummings and Mr J. G. Patey also "assisted." M. Paque was the violoncellist, and played, in his well-known artistic style, a "Transcription" of one of Schubert's songs, and a Gavotte. Mr Radcliff, besides accompanying Mdlle Albani, played a flute solo, introducing some well-known and popular melody in his most perfect manner. Mr Kuhe's contributions were, besides joining in some concerted pieces, a piece by Gottschalk, and, as an encore, his well-known and admired "Etude de Concert."—Miss Lillie Albrecht has being playing at the Aquarium Concerts with great success; among her most successful pieces being Mendelssohn's Fugue in F minor (Op. 5), Chopin's Ballade in G minor, and Ascher's popular romance, "Alice." After each performance Miss Albrecht was warmly applauded and recalled. Mdlle Cristino has been the vocalist.

(To the Editor of the "Trovatore.")

DEAR SIR,—The difficulty in these latter times of being able to find a tenor who shall realise the ideal of the habitués of my theatre has induced me to adopt the idea of attempting to obtain the object of our desires by offering a competition with prizes. I shall be immensely grateful if, by means of your valuable journal, you will have the goodness to call attention to the fact that, on my return from America, which will probably be in the month of October (?), I intend to visit Milan, Bologna, and Florence, and in each of these cities, which are artistic centres, I will, assisted by competent musical authorities, hold, on a date to be hereafter fixed, an examination and hearing of as many tenors as may wish to present themselves, furnished with the following qualifications:—1. They must have intelligence and musical knowledge. 2. In addition to their own dialect they must be able to speak and read the Italian language. 3. They must have a good personal appearance, free from bodily deformity, and, if possible, genial and sympathetic faces. 4. They must have the manners of gentlemen, must not be addicted to bad habits nor eccentricities, they must not wear wigs nor false teeth, they must be in the habit of invariably walking abroad in suitable attire with clean shirts, their hands well washed, and without the usual mourning rim beneath the tips of their finger nails. 5. They must have agreeable voices, free from tremolo, of a plaintive and elastic character, and must be able to sing with ease from piano to forte, and vice versâ. 6. They must have had good experience of the stage, and also have a sufficiently extensive repertory, for instance, Faust, the Sonnambula, Lucia, the Puritani, Don Giovanni, Marta, Lucrezia Borgia, the Favorita, Traviata, Un Ballo in Maschera, Anna Bolena, &c. 7. A stature about five and a half feet (English measure). A choice will be made of two tenors. To the agent who shall have presented the first one in order of merit who shall be chosen by me, or to the artist himself if he have no agent, I shall present a prize of 6000 lire, Italian money (about £240 sterling), and to the second in order of merit or his agent, a prize of 1,000 lire (about £40). An agent who presents an artist must produce a special authorisation of being commissioned to do so by him. Every communication during my absence must be directed to me, at the office of her Majesty's Opera, 1, Pall Mall. London.—Yours truly,

J. H. MAPLESON.

No. 15.

Johann Mattheson, a native of Hamburg, was born in 1681. In the seventh year of his age he was instructed by different masters in the rudiments of learning and the principles of music; at the age of nine he was able to sing, to the organ at Hamburg, compositions of his own. At the age of eighteen he composed an opera, and performed the principal part. Mattheson was well acquainted with Handel. Before the latter came to settle in England they were in some degree rivals, and solicited with equal ardour the favour of the public. Mattheson relates that he had often vied with Handel on the organ, both at Hamburg and Lubeck. The terms upon which these two great men lived, when they were together, must appear very strange. Handel approved so highly of the compositions of Mattheson, particularly his lessons, that he used to play them for his private amusement; and Mattheson had so great a regard for Handel, that he at one time entertained thoughts of writing his life. Yet these two men were in one moment of their lives at so great an enmity, that each had the other opposed to the point of his sword; in short, upon a dispute about the seat of the harpsichord at the performances of one of Mattheson's operas, they fought a duel in the market-place of Hamburg, which a mere accident prevented from being mortal to one or both of them. Mattheson died at Hamburg in the year 1764.

Phil. Meyer, Sen., was born at Strassburg, in Alsatia, in the year 1737. When about twenty years of age, meeting by accident with an old German harp without pedals, he took so much pleasure in playing on it, as to confirm his strong musical inclination so decidedly, that he left college with a resolution to devote himself to the musical profession, and for that purpose he went to Paris. He here met with early encouragement, but found the harp very little known, and very incomplete. The occasional semitones were then produced by means of hooks turned with the left hand, which operation, during the continuance of performance, rendered the resources of modulation extremely confined. Meyer now applied himself, with the assistance of an instrument-maker, to improve the harp. Two and three pedals were at first added, and after progressive additions, Meyer and Naderman brought the seven pedals to perfection. By this time the harp was very much cultivated at Paris, and Meyer published the first principles of the instrument, entitled Méthode de la Harpe, which was long esteemed by the first professors as a sure guide to that instrument. Some sonatas also established his claim as a composer. He then went to Strassburg, married, and returned to Paris, where, after a few years, he was tempted to visit London. He here found the pedal harp hardly known; and soon met with so much encouragement among the first nobility, that he made London his principal abode for several years, till, the American war breaking out, he was induced again to go to Paris. He returned to London with his family about the year 1784. He died in 1819, aged eighty-two.

Dr Edward Miller was for fifty years organist at Doncaster. He composed new tunes for the Psalms of David, which were patronized by the King, and a list of nearly five thousand subscribers. His principal work, however, was The Elements of Thorough-bass and Composition, a book highly esteemed. Dr Miller played the flute in Handel's first oratorios. He died at Doncaster, in 1807, aged seventy-six.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

We are just at the beginning of our local musical season; and the first concert—given last week—had the advantage of the presence of the peerless Adelina Patti. Surely it is sufficient to tell you that she sang nine times, that she was in splendid voice, and that everything she sang was received with enthusiastic applause. Signor Urio and Signor Campobello were the only other singers; but the performances of Mdlle Castellan and Mr Kuhe, the impresario of the evening, gave variety to the concert.

The following pleasant programme ushered in the new season of the Gentlemen's Concerts:

Symphony, in B flat, No. 4 (Beethoven); Aria, "Bel raggio," Semiramide (Rossini)—Mdme Sinico-Campobello; Solo Violin, Concerto in A minor, No. 5 (Vieuxtemps)—M. Wieniawski; Aria, "Deh vieni," Le Nozze di Figaro (Mozart)—Mdme Sinico-Campobello; Overture, Oberon (Weber); Overture, Love's Labour Lost (first time) (W. G. Cusins); Song, "First Rose of Summer" (Campana)—Mdme Sinico-Campobello; Solo Violin, Romanza in F major (Beethoven)—M. Wieniawski; Song, "L'Estasi" (Arditi)—Mdme Sinico-Campobello; Solo Violin, "Russian Airs" (Wieniawski)—M. Wieniawski; Overture, "Impresario" (Mozart).

The symphony and overtures were admirably played. Mdme Sinico was as artistic as ever; and though M. Wieniawski, in consequence of delay in the arrival of the orchestral parts, had been unable to rehearse Vieuxtemp's concerto, he played it superbly. Three times during the evening he was interrupted by the breaking of a string in his own Russian Airs. Indeed, this happened twice on two different violins; but on each occasion he borrowed an instrument from the nearest member of the orchestra, and played valiantly to the end. In noticing this concert, the local newspapers refer to the illness of an artist, whose retirement from the profession would be lamented, not here only, but in many parts of the kingdom. The Guardian says:—

"In the absence of Mr Hallé, Mr Hecht proved an excellent substitute, no lack of vigour or intelligence being noticeable during the evening. Another face, however, was missing which, during the recollection of most of us, has scarcely ever been absent from an orchestral performance of any importance anywhere in this neighbourhood; while, at the Concert Hall, but one performance has been given since he first undertook the post of leader, in 1837, without his presence. We allude, of course, to the absence of Mr C. A. Seymour, who for some time past has suffered from serious illness, and who, with the conscientiousness that characterized his every action, has felt it necessary, for the present at least, to give up his engagements for the coming season. All of our readers will, we are sure, regret the necessity for this. In the ranks of the musical profession, none, we believe, has a higher claim to the respect—nay, we are sure we may say, the affection—of all who have enjoyed the privilege of his friendship, than Mr Seymour. We could not allow the notice of this concert to conclude without reference to a circumstance which, to those who were aware of it, detracted much from the enjoyment of the evening. But, while we hope that Mr Seymour may be restored to his post in health and strength again, we feel that his long career deserves a fuller recognition than we are able to give it in these hastily-written lines.

The Examiner and Times also notices Mr Seymour's illness:—

In the absence of Mr Hallé Mr Hecht conducted the orchestra with—as it is needless to say—unfailing discrimination and judgment, and Mr Hallé, doubtless extends his holiday without hesitation so far as the first of these concerts is concerned, remembering that his place can be so efficiently filled. Another absence, however, and one scarcely less conspicuous, was the source of deep and general regret. For the first time within our recollection Mr C. A. Seymour, the leader of the orchestra, was unable to be at his post, and we are sorry to hear that he is suffering from indisposition, sufficiently serious to prevent the hope of his appearance in the orchestra, for at least a long time. Mr Seymour's genial disposition and his unfailing courtesy have made him universally popular, and not even his accomplishments as a musician, have been more heartily appreciated then his private virtues. The dignity of his profession has always been maintained by Mr Seymour; and, though we sincerely hope his retirement may be only for a short time, we may add that few living artists can look back to a longer unblemished and useful career, or can claim a larger circle of devoted friends.

The season promises to be unusually interesting. A new opera, by Mr Alfred Cellier, will be produced at the Prince's Theatre on Monday next.

Sept. 25, 1875. ——o——

FROM FLORENCE.

Speaking of Sig. Biletta's opera recently produced at the Teatro Principe Umberto, the Nazione says:—

"The opera, La Rosa di Firenze, written by the Cavaliere Biletta, and represented on the 22nd September, achieved a success as satisfactory as it was genuine and merited. Various members were lustily applauded, some being encored, and the composer had to appear on the stage time after time. The music of La Rosa di Firenze is all of the brightest; it is essentially melodious; it is treated lovingly and learnedly; it is simple and elegant simultaneously; and, though written some ten years, it is most lively and fresh. We congratulate the Chevalier Biletta on it. The singers and the orchestra vied with each other in zeal. The tenor, Sig. Armandi-Villa, and the young barytone, Sig. Carpi, experienced no lack of applause, but the largest portion fell to the share of Signora Bennati, who possesses an agreeable and well-trained voice. In the canzonetta: "Il Tramonto cadea placido e vago" (a perfect gem), she evoked a storm of applause which seemed interminable, and she had to repeat the number."

Le Touriste, a French local paper, is equally flattering, it says:

"Yesterday evening the first performance of La Rosa di Firenze by the maestro, Chevalier Biletta was produced. The work was perfectly successful, and every one present was delighted. M. Jefte Sbolci, who has just added to his reputation, already so firmly established, by the brilliant manner in which he directed the execution of Verdi's Requiem, acted as conductor. Mad. Bennati, a young and excellent artist, whom we had occasion to applaud in Guillaume Tell, was recalled several times, and had to recommence her characteristic song in the third act. She was presented with a magnificent basket of flowers. The tenor, Armandi, and the barytone, Carpi, had also their share of applause, as they deserved to have. The Chevalier Biletta, the happy author of the opera, was called on more than twenty times, and must have been very much fatigued at the end of the evening. We wish him, and ourselves as well, many similar evenings. His music is melodious, artistically treated, and full of movement. In a word, the Chevelier Biletta is a maestro worthy of the name, and has fully justified the reputation which preceded his arrival in this city. We mean to go and witness this opera again, when we shall speak of it at greater length; for one cannot really appreciate beautiful things without seeing and hearing them repeatedly."

A MME RATTAZZI.

NÉE MARIE BUONAPARTE.

La gloire a deux courants, ainsi que les héros.
En France, ô Rattazzi, nous aimons les Saphos.
Maria Buonaparte est une autre Corinne;
Sa grâce et son esprit disent son origine.
Quand, s'échappant en feu de ses trésors ouverts,
Son âme dans les cœurs se répand en beaux vers,
Elle a sa cour d'honneur, où de brillants poëtes
Tiennent à ses accents leurs extases muettes.
Elle est reine ou déesse de l'âme en action,
Elle est le feu sacré de l'inspiration.
Une grâce enivrante à sa beauté se mêle;
On ne s'appartient plus dès qu'on est auprès d'elle;
Mais, quand de sa raison s'allume le flambleau,
On se croit transporté dans un monde plus beau.
Tour à tour, en parlant, ou sublime ou touchante,
Sa pensée, éblouit et sa parole enchante.
Rivaux de la prêtresse, et dans l'Olympe admis,
Nous tous l'environnant de nos lauriers amis,
Nous lui portons les chants de nos lyres confuses
Et là nous l'invoquons: on invoque les muses!

Aix-les-Bains, 15 Août. BELMONTET.

LEIPSIC.—"At the unanimous request of the University," writes the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, "Dr Ludwig Nohl has been appointed by the Ministry to a professorship at Heidelberg, and a yearly honorary salary assigned him, out of the University funds, for lecturing on musico-historical subjects. During the next six months, he will lecture on the history of opera, from Gluck down to Wagner! This is assuredly the first time that the latter name was ever found in an official University list." The editor of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung remarks on the above: "This statement, from what we know of Nohl's writings, strikes us as scarcely credible, and we reproduce it simply because we meet with it in a well conducted and respectable artistic organ."

SECT. 5. The said corporation may from time to time borrow such sum or sums of money as may be necessary to build, finish, furnish, equip, repair or alter said building, or for the payment of any of its indebtedness then existing, or for any other purposes authorized by this act and the objects of their incorporation, and may issue and dispose of their bonds for any amount so borrowed; and they are hereby authorized to mortgage the whole or any part of their real estate to secure the payment of such bonds. And they shall have power to issue certificates of stock to their members or others, for moneys contributed to any of the purposes aforesaid, and representing the moneys invested in the said buildings, its appurtenances and contents, or any portion thereof; and with the consent of the holder of such bonds as aforesaid, to convert such bonds or any of them into certificates of stock as aforesaid, and for that purpose to issue such certificates of stock as may be necessary.

SECT. 6. The said corporation shall have power from time to time to make and establish such by-laws, rules and regulations not inconsistent with any existing law, as they shall judge proper, for the election of their officers and agents, for prescribing their respective functions, and the mode of performing the same, for allowing them or any of them a suitable compensation, for the admission of members, for imposing and collecting admission fees, fines and contributions from members, for defraying the erection of the building hereinbefore authorized, for regulating the times and places of meeting, for suspending or expelling such members as shall refuse or neglect to comply with the said by-laws and regulations, and generally for the management of their property, the regulation of their affairs and the transfer of their stock.

SECT. 7. The said officers of the said corporation may demand and take security from their Treasurer or Trustees, from time to time, for the faithful performance of any trust reposed in them, in such manner and form as to them shall deem fit, and all contracts and obligations for that purpose made and entered into, shall be valid and effectual in the law.

SECT. 8. In case of the death, resignation, misconduct, neglect, or refusal to act of any of the said officers or Trustees, the members of the said corporation may, at any regular meeting, elect by ballot, any other officer or officers, Trustee or Trustees, in the place or stead of the officer or Trustee dying, resigning, misbehaving, neglecting, or refusal, and the persons so elected shall hold their offices until the coming into office in their place of officers elected at the next ensuing annual election.

SECT. 9. If an election of the said officers or Trustees shall not be held in any year at the time appointed for that purpose by this act, the said corporation shall not, for that cause, be dissolved, but the said officers or Trustees, for the time being, shall remain in their respective offices until an election shall be held and such other time or place in said city as to them shall appear proper, they having first given the like due notice thereof, as is hereinbefore required, in the case of regular annual election.

SECT. 10. This act is hereby declared to be a public act, and shall be favourably construed in all courts and places for the purposes thereby intended; and no misnomer of the said corporation in any deed, grant, gift, devise, bequest, or other instrument, contract or conveyance, shall defeat or vitiate the same, if the corporation be sufficiently described, to show or ascertain the intention of the parties.

SECT. 11. The provisions contained in Title 3 of Chapter XVIII of the first part of the Revised Statutes, shall be deemed and taken as part of this act, except where they are herein altered, modified or changed.

SECT. 12. The Legislature reserve the right of repealing, altering or modifying this act, an any time hereafter.

SECT. 13. This act shall take effect immediately.

State of New York, Office of the Secretary of State.

I have compared the preceding with the original law on file, and do hereby certify that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of the act.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at the City of Albany, this fourteenth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW,
Secretary of State.

* Founded April 23, 1863; organized and adopted June 26, 1864; amended and revised September 13, 1867, March 25th, 1869, and March 14, 1872.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT AND THE NORWICH FESTIVAL.

At a meeting of the Norwich Corporation, Mr Sheriff Youngs, in the name of the Council, asked that thanks be given to the managers of the Festival for the excellent arrangements they had made for them on Monday evening. On former occasions he had not hesitated to criticise the Festival committee if he felt it to be necessary in the public interest; but, on Monday evening, the Mayor, a large body of the magistrates and members of the Town Council, with their ladies and friends, who had the honour and pleasure of accompanying him, were received and arrangements made for their reception in every way suitable to the dignity of the Council and the credit of the city; and he trusted that the brilliant commencement and the excellent attendance last evening would be an augury of the success of the coming concerts. It would be gratifying for all to know that never at any previous Festival had there been in the city a larger attendance of those who might fairly be called strangers, lovers of music, who had come from a considerable distance. He trusted that there might arise, if there had not already arisen, a desire amongst the citizens and their friends in the county to show, by their attendance, that they appreciated the company and the support of the strangers. Nor could he forget that the promoters of the Festival were receiving for the eleventh time the services of that venerable professor and master of music, Sir Julius Benedict, as conductor. Though laden with honours, knighted by the Crown, and showered with testimonials by the musical profession, Sir Julius was still devoted to the Norwich Musical Festival, and bestowed upon it an amount of attention which could hardly be expected from him; in fact, it might almost be thought he had recovered his youthful days, for in one of the performances, which he was glad to know would be numerously supported, would be introduced a special composition of his own. In conclusion, the Sheriff expressed a hope that the Festival might be a success. Mr Patteson concurred entirely in what had fallen from the Sheriff, adding that he never saw at the opening of any previous Festival so large an attendance as on Monday evening. He seconded the vote of thanks to the Festival Committee. The Mayor agreed to the proposed resolution, and concurred with what the Sheriff had said respecting Sir Julius Benedict, his guest, of whose enthusiasm in his work he spoke in warm terms. The vote was carried unanimously.—Norwich Mercury.

CAIRO.—Drahnet Bey, Superintendent of the Vice-Regal Theatres, has engaged for the winter season Signore Fricci, Smeroschi, Cristofani, Waldmann, Braccialini, Grassi; Signori Fancelli, Masini, Piazza, Stile, Pandolfini, N. Vergar, Visai, Medini, Milesi, Calcaterra, and L. Fioravanti. Conductor: Sig. Bottesini.

COPENHAGEN.—Mad. Deméric-Lablache gave a concert, on the 14th September, in the Folk's Theatre. She sang, among other things, Meyerbeer's "Ah! mon Fils!" Siebel's Romance from Gounod's Faust, and the brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia. M. Albert, a French violoncellist, who accompanies her on her tour, played a "Cradle Song" by Seligmann, and an original Fantasia on Swedish melodies. —During the summer season, B. Dahl gave, at Tivoli, various orchestral works by Heinrich Hofmann and Judassohn, which were well received.—M. Ramsöe has resigned his post of conductor at Klampenborg (a summer resort like Tivoli), and at the Folk's Theatre, to accept the direction of Blanche's Concerts at Stockholm. —Mad. Trebelli was expected about the end of September, with a concert company comprising Herren C. Behrens (basso), Henneberg (pianist), and Oberthür (harp). Ole Bull has announced a series of concerts for the middle of October.—An opera by Hallström is in rehearsal at the Theatre Royal. Tannhäuser has been performed with a partly new cast, but it is not more successful now than it was previously.

Miss Howson will be the first Australian prima donna who has made her appearance in Italy.

Dr Hanslick devotes his entire article in the Vienna Neue freie Presse, of the 11th inst., to musical matters in France. He sums up thus: "All these facts prove that the young French Republic pays no less attention to art and artists than the old monarchy; they demonstrate clearly that the French are still devoted to music, and justly consider it as one of the most solid supports of their national glory."

Mr and Mrs German Reed's Entertainment reopens on Monday, October 4th, at St George's Hall, with the very successful production, by Mr W. S. Gilbert, Eyes and no Eyes. Mr Corney Grain will give a musical sketch, and Mr Burnand's lively Tale of Old China will be included in the programme. Mrs German Reed, Miss Fanny Holland, Miss Leonora Braham, Mr Corney Grain, Mr Bishop, and Mr Alfred Reed will appear.

"ST ANN'S TUNE."—A DISCOVERY.—This well known church hymn tune, which has been treated by Bach, Macfarren, and other less noted musicians, as a fugal subject, is almost invariably attributed to Dr Croft. In the Leeds Exhibition, however, there may now be seen an octavo book, in which the tune is called "Leeds Tune," by Mr Denby. This book belongs to Mr Thomas T. Turner, master of St Philip's Schools, Leeds. It was "licensed Feb. 14th, 1687-8," and printed by John White, sen., of York, for Abraham Barber, bookseller, of Wakefield, who also revised and corrected it. The music notes are of the old lozenge shape, with the canto fermo (or air) in the tenor. This discovery (for so we conceive it to be), is most interesting to musical people generally, and to this district in particular, as the probability is that "Mr Denby," the composer of a hymn tune admittedly one of the finest we possess, was a West Riding if not a Leeds man. Dr Croft was born in 1667.—Leeds Express.

"How's politics?" asked a Yankee politician of a newspaper man. "Well," was the reply, "politics and newspapers are somewhat alike just now. As the newsboy said, 'there's a good deal of news, but nothing to holler.'"

THE NORWICH FESTIVAL.—"H. S." writes:—"A misapprehension appears to be entertained with regard to the circumstance that the oratorios are performed in St Andrew's Hall rather than in the Cathedral of Norwich. The facts are these. Previous to fifty years ago, oratorios used to be performed in the Cathedral. When Festivals began to be established on a larger scale the performances of oratorios were transferred to St Andrew's Hall, which before the Reformation was the nave of the church of the Dominican Convent. It was deemed, and, as experienced has proved, deemed wisely, that this Hall was better suited to the performance of oratorios than the nave of the Cathedral, with its massive Norman architecture, which, though it might give a certain advantage to the effect of a sacred composition, offered much hindrance in the way of sound, of hearing, and of facility for a large audience. Neither at the time I speak of, fifty years ago, nor more recently, have the Dean and Chapter been asked to grant the use of the Cathedral for the performance of oratorios, and therefore they have not had the opportunity of refusing, even if they had the inclination to do so."

ANTWERP.—The operatic season was inaugurated by Les Huguenots.

NUREMBERG.—Rienzi, by Herr R. Wagner, and Die Maccabäer, by Anton Rubinstein, will be among the novelties produced during the present season at the Stadttheater.

MADRID.—The following are the artists engaged for the approaching Italian opera season at the Teatro Real: Signore Cortes, Fossa, Ferrari, Lucchini, Pozzoni-Anastasi; Signori Anastasi, Stagno, Tamberlik, Amodio, Boccolini, Rondil, Cruz, David, Ordinas, and Fiorini. M. Skoczdopole will officiate as Conductor.

ROME.—It is probable that the Teatro Apollo will remain closed this year. The Teatro Argentina, on the contrary, was to open in the early part of the present month with a new opera, Diana, by Sig. Sangiorgi. A vaudeville, entitled I Corsari nelle Coste d'Otranto, has been produced at the Teatro Quirino. It is, however, only Giroflé-Girofla, re-baptised and altered, to spare the manager the necessity of paying authors' rights.

MAJOLATI.—The following is the inscription on the tablet let into the front of the Ospizio dei Cronaci:—"Gaspare Spontini—Born at Majolati of humble parents—The 14th November, 1774—Master of sublime and unrivalled melodies—Deservedly honoured all over Europe—Gave for the benefit of his native place—the great riches he had acquired. The Commune—on the hundreth celebration of their great citizen's birthday—Placed here this memorial."

PARIS.—At the Exhibition building in the Champs-Elysées, a day or two ago, a young lady was asked to try one of Herz's pianos. After playing for a short time, a large audience assembled around her, when the delicacy and firmness of her touch, her taste, and brilliant execution, drew down repeated rounds of applause. When she rose from the piano, several of the audience were desirous of knowing who she was, and where she came from, when they were informed that she was Miss Marianne Rock, from London, well known and admired at the Covent Garden and Royal Albert Hall Concerts. Miss Rock was passing through Paris, on her return from her summer vacation, to her home at Greenwich, when this pleasant episode, so flattering to her, occurred.

BERGAMO.—The festival in honour of Mayr and Donizetti proved very successful. It began by the transfer of the mortal remains of the two masters from their temporary resting place in the Cemetery to the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore. Then came a concert, at which nothing but works of the two masters were performed. In the evening, there was a representation of Don Sebastiano, with Mad. Destin, Signori Abrugnedo, Pandolfini, and Povoleri. The next day, a Requiem by Mayr was performed, several pieces by Donizetti and Nini being interpolated in it. The festival wound up with a grand concert, the principal feature of which was a cantata written expressly for the occasion by Sig. Ponchielli, and entitled: Omaggio a Donizetti. The singers were Signore Peralta, Ponchielli-Brambilla, Signori Campanini, Capponi, and Pandolfini.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"THE MAIDEN'S TEAR."

Composed by LILLIE ALBRECHT.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"Miss Albrecht shows herself as clever a composer as she is a skilful performer, her Second Rêverie being a well designed, and excellently wrought-out Morceau de Salon, consisting of an introduction, melody, and variations. Considerable knowledge of the technicalities of the instrument is displayed in the writing, and the whole forms a most brilliant and effective solo. For scholastic purposes, as well as for public performances, the 'Maiden's Tear' will be found of great service." Sunday Times, January 10th, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht, Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, is a good and useful teaching piece, calculated only to justify its title in the case of the union of two such elements as incompetency in the pupil and irritation on the part of the master."—Morning Post, February 3rd, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. Brilliant and full of feeling, this Rêverie may take its rank with the best of Mr Sidney Smith's compositions."—Young Englishwoman, May, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. A carefully conceived and well studied composition; the composer is evidently a zealous student, and she has apparently much natural ability."—Hornet, April 28, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht. After the style of Brinley Richards, this drawing-room piece is brilliant without being difficult, and shows both talent and knowledge of the laws of musical composition on the part of the composer, who is, we believe, a very young lady."—The Drawing Room Gazette, June 19th, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. This charming piece evinces in its style throughout no small share of original talent, as well as sparkling and artistic cultivation, it being full of delicate and plaintive feeling. We have no doubt that it will be very popular, both in the concert-room and saloon."—Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, May, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Sigh' and 'The Maiden's Tear,' two reveries for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. These are both from the pen of a highly talented and proficient pianiste, and are of considerable merit. The first is a pretty little exercise, and the fingering is excellent; the second is far prettier, and as a morceau de salon has exceptional merit, whilst at the same time it is unconventional."—Public Opinion.

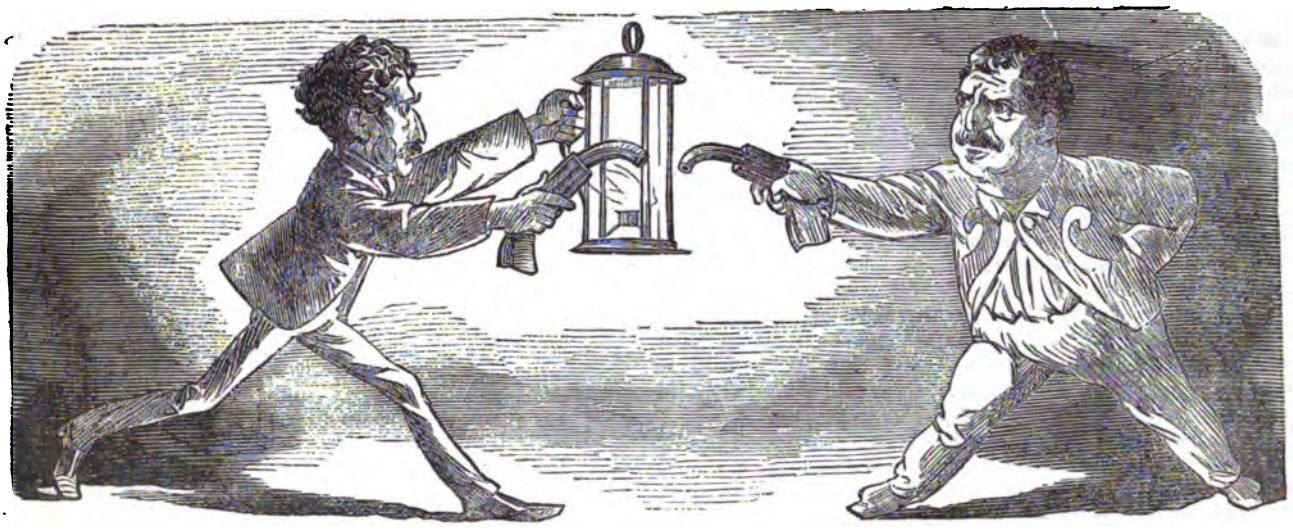
A Projected Duello.



Which did not come off—Hector being shy of Achilles, and Achilles shy of Hector. Had it been Ajax Cassagnac, and Ulysses Rochefort, the case might have been indifferently the same.—Klawderadatsch.

MACBETH AT THE LYCEUM.

(From the "Times.")

A week has passed since the revival of Macbeth at the Lyceum, and the peculiarities of that revival form the chief topic of discourse in theatrical circles—the manner in which the principal personages are represented, and the novel style in which the piece is put upon the stage as a consistent work of art, being alike subjects of comment. The deep and enduring impression made by Mr Irving's first Shaksperian impersonation, and that in a part which had frequently been repeated without leaving any impression at all, naturally made all London curious as to the success of his second venture in the same direction. Be it added that, whether his Macbeth proved more or less fortunate than his Hamlet, it was certain to be an original and meritorious performance. He is sure to think through every part that he undertakes; he is certain not to trouble himself about the points that may have been made by his histrionic predecessors, but to consider what sort of character is intended by the text, and by what details that character must be revealed. If he deviates from a beaten track we may be sure that he has some reason for his deviation.

Now, there is no doubt that his Macbeth differs widely from the person present to the mind of ordinary playgoers. The popular Macbeth was not only a brave soldier, with all the physical qualities proper to his vocation, but likewise an apparently well-disposed man, who might have gone on safely to the end of his days had he not unluckily met three evil old women on a heath, who put wicked thoughts into his head, and had he not, moreover, been cursed with an unscrupulous wife, who did her best, or rather her worst, to mature these thoughts into action. That he is irresolute, that he does not at once plunge into an abyss of crime, is the more to his credit. But there is one peculiarity in Macbeth's nature which is commonly overlooked, and which seems to have been carefully noted by Mr Irving. The evil agencies by which he is influenced are universally recognized; not so the extreme facility with which he yields to them. In his very first scene, when he has not been on the stage two minutes, no sooner has he been successively greeted by the witches as Glamis, Cawdor, and "King hereafter," than his manner suggests to Banquo, in whom the witches cause no terror whatever, the question,—

> "Good Sir, why do you start and seem to fear > Things that do sound so fair?"

The information a few minutes afterwards that the first prediction has been fulfilled leads immediately to a self-confession of murderous devices, conveyed in a speech too familiar to need citation. There is no nobility of nature about Macbeth; he is totally impotent to resist the very earliest allurements to crime, and is utterly without the fortitude to endure its consequences. After she has read his letter, and before she has seen him, his lady sums him up as one who would not play false, and yet would wrongly win. There is not a common thief who would not rather find a gold watch on the pavement than pick it from a pocket, and who is not therefore entitled to analogous praise. Lady Macbeth does not look upon her husband as her superior in virtue, but as her inferior in courage, and she is perfectly confident that when she exerts her influence she will have all her own way; and have her own way she does, as the weird sisters have already had theirs. The conjugal discussion relative to the murder of Duncan leaves from the first no doubt on which side victory will ultimately lie.

It is this inability to resist all inducements to crime, coupled with the depressing anguish which follows its perpetration, that constitutes the peculiarity of Mr Irving's Macbeth; and those who expect a conflict between the good and bad elements in the composition of a brave man will, probably, find his interpretation somewhat monotonous. But Mr Irving is precisely what his Macbeth is not; he has a will of his own, and when he has formed a conception he is determined to carry it out. His Macbeth is from beginning to end consistent. He is scared by the witches, he is scared by the project of murder, he is scared by the progress of its execution. When thoroughly convinced that resistance is useless, he can rush into the murder of Banquo; but when the ghost appears he is scared as never man was scared before, and wraps his cloak over his face that he may not behold the horrible spectre. He is only brave when there is clearly nothing to be lost or won—namely, in the final combat;—that is to say, he can "die game." Accept Mr Irving's primary idea and you cannot hesitate to adopt his conclusion.

Miss Bateman's Lady is, as it ought to be, the exact reverse of Mr Irving's Macbeth. The grand manner in which she evokes the spirits of evil before the entrance of the Thane, that she may brace herself for the coming conflict, will remind many readers of the incantation in Légouvé's Medea. From the preternatural to the natural she bounds in the hearty greeting with which she welcomes her husband. Then begins the long debate, carried virtually through two acts, in which the victory of the stronger over the more feeble nature is distinctly shown at every point in the battle—a battle which, we repeat, is not the struggle of wickedness with goodness, but of courage with the feeble resistance of cowardice. The mental superiority of the lady is also made singularly conspicuous in the ghost scene, where her unfailing presence of mind is strongly contrasted with the abject terror of Macbeth. Macduff is represented with true manly pathos by Mr T. Swinbourne, and the combat is in the best spirit.

While ample justice is done to the representation of the human personages, the greatest pains have been taken to give full importance to the supernatural agencies, who are so essential to the story. On the first ascent of the curtain the witches are seen through a gap in a mass of clouds, lighted, only at intervals, by flashes. We are on a border-land between two worlds; and, when they are afterwards seen on the actual boards, the witches preserve their weird appearance. Represented to the life, if the expression may be used, by Messrs Mead and Archer and Mrs Huntley, they dance and gesticulate as they were never seen to dance or gesticulate before, and their home is a Cave of Acheron—with clouds in the background, whence songs proceed—such as was never before seen. They illustrate the spirit of the play; they do not crush it as they sometimes did when they headed the very earthly body of vocalists who sang the now omitted music interpolated by Davenant. To the spiritual character given to Banquo's ghost we have already referred.

Nothing, in short, has been left undone that could render the performance in every respect complete. The Scotch scenery, by Messrs Hawes and Cuthbert, is beautiful, and the effect, produced by masses, is effective in the extreme. The revival itself, and the interest taken in it by a very large portion of the public, confirm the opinion formed last year, that a taste for intellectual and poetical drama is once more among us. The work begun by the late Mr H. L. Bateman is worthily continued by his widow.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Dear Sir,—The following arrangements, which will be announced to members as soon as printed, have already been made. I shall have the pleasure of commencing the session with a paper on "Musical Criticism." Papers will be read during the session by Rev. Sir F. Gore Ouseley, Dr W. Pole, F.R.S., Prof. Monk, of King's College, and William Spottiswoode, Esq., F.R.S. Further arrangements are in progress. The subjects of the papers will be announced at each meeting, and advertised a few days before.—Yours faithfully,

CHARLES K. SALAMAN, Hon. Sec.

WEIMAR.—The Committee of the Shakspere Society have memorialised the Minister of Public Instruction, Dr Falk, begging him to establish an Academic High School for Dramatic Art.

HAMBURGH.—Mdlle Pappenheim sailed a short time since for New York, where she has been engaged by Herr Neundorff for the Stadttheater. Previously to starting she addressed the following letter to the editor of the Fremdenblatt:—"The magnificent offer I have received to accompany Wachtel to America, an offer which, both artistically and pecuniarily is so highly advantageous, induced me repeatedly to request my manager, Herr Pollini, to free me from my obligations. Not being able to prevail on him to do so, I had no alternative but to adopt the sad course of breaking my engagement. May I beg you to consider this step as only the result of artistic ambition, for it is with a heavy heart that I leave Hamburgh where I have been so well treated. Have the goodness, I beg of you, to insert these few words in my justification, and preserve a friendly recollection of me till I return. Begging you to make the same request for me to the gentleman who is your musical critic, I remain, etc., Eugenie Pappenheim." What the young lady says about the offer being so advantageous both "artistically and pecuniarily" does not seem to square exactly with her subsequent assertion, that the step she has taken is only the "result of artistic ambition."—The Stadttheater, under the energetic management of Sig. Pollini, is rapidly recovering its lost popularity. The classical repertory is gradually replacing music of a less elevated character in its programmes. Thus, in one week lately, Sig. Pollini gave Don Juan, Le Nozze, Der Freischütz (twice), and The Huguenots. On each occasion the theatre was full.

BAD CREUZNACH (PRUSSIA).

An esteemed Correspondent writes us that it, perhaps, may be interesting to give a condensed survey of the musical performances at this very frequented watering-place, which is a favoured resort of a great many English visitors, to whom the excellent music provided is one of its chief attractions. The writer of these lines, who spent the whole of last spring and summer at this charming place, retains the most pleasing reminiscences, for which the musical performances here furnished the principal part. The musical season opened with two concerts, in the style of the Rhenish Music festivals; and the warmest thanks are due to Music-Director Herr Enzian, through whose exertions the concerts were arranged and conducted. On the first day Mendelssohn's Paulus was performed; the second day was miscellaneous—Herr Richard Wagner's overture to Tannhäuser and the march from Raff's Leonore, variations from a string quartet, by Beethoven, besides choruses and part-songs from Paulus and Lohengrin, were given. The artists were—Fraülein Moss, from Düsseldorf (soprano); Fraülein Schreiber (alto), Herr J. Wolff, from Cologne (tenor); and Herr G. Henschel, from Berlin (bass). The choral societies of Creuznach and Bingen contributed to the success of these concerts; and too much praise cannot be awarded to the members of the orchestra. The gem of the second concert was Schumann's Piano Concerto in A minor, played by Music Director Herr W. de Haan (from Bingen). In the second concert the orchestra was conducted by Capellmeister Herr Mannsfeldt. The concerts of Fraülein Horson, Herr J. Wolff, and Herr H. Mannsfeldt, have already been mentioned in the Musical World. Among other interesting concerts we have yet to record the one given by Mdme Peschka-Leutner, assisted by Music Director Herr Enzian and the orchestra of the Kurhaus. Mdme Peschka-Leutner sang the grand aria from Mozart's Zauberflöte, besides several effective songs, and, on being enthusiastically recalled, she gave Proch's Variations in splendid style. Music Director Herr Enzian played, in a highly artistic manner, Chopin's Concerto in E minor, and Liszt's "Ricordanza;" and the orchestra, under the direction of Herr Mannsfeldt, performed Mendelssohn's overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, and the prelude to Lohengrin. Another concert that was projected had, to the regret of many, to be given up. In this concert it was expected to hear the renowned London harpist, Charles Oberthür, who has already established in Creuznach his reputation as one of the greatest artists on the instrument of his choice; but it appears that Herr Oberthür could not visit Germany during last summer. Of particular interest have been also the Symphonie Concerts, which took place every Thursday, at the Kursaal, at which the élite of the public was present, and where the symphonies of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, as also other orchestral works by Wagner, Gade, Sterndale Bennett, &c., were excellently performed. On such satisfactory achievements one may look back with pardonable pride, and, in grateful acknowledgment of so many musical treats, we depart from the scene of them, with our most sincere wishes for the future success of Creuznach's musical endeavours. (From our own Correspondent.)*

At the Italian Opera this week we have had Lucrezia Borgia, with Grisi and Mario, both of whom were more successful in this opera than in any other which has been produced for them during the present season. Report says that, in consequence of the destruction of Covent Garden, it is not unlikely an arrangement may be made to continue the Italian season in Paris some time longer, with the addition of Mdme Bosio and other distinguished artists engaged by Mr Gye.

Paris, March 26th, 1855.

* Delayed in transmission.—ED.

FLORENCE.—Verdi's Requiem has been given with success.

VIENNA.—Sig. Merelli's Italian Opera company, comprising Mesdes Patti, Lucca, MM. Capoul, Nicolini, and Faure, besides a goodly sprinkling of lesser celebrities, will shortly commence a two months' engagement at the Imperial Operahouse. During this time there will be no performance by the German company. By the terms of his agreement Sig. Merelli is bound to give at least one novelty.—The unfortunate Komische Oper has at last found a manager in Herr Rosenthal, who has taken the theatre for three years, at a rental of 45,000, 50,000, and 55,000 florins, the first, second, and third years, respectively. He had to pay a deposit of 30,000 florins, as guarantee for the wages of the persons holding subordinate situations.

A DREAM OF THE NEAR PAST.

. . . . Commenced the sale of "the valuable private library of the late eminent publisher, Richard Bentley, Esquire," at the rooms of Messrs Sotheby and Wilkinson, in Wellington Street, Strand. . . . . The remaining portions of the same library will be sold, and . . . the engravings, drawings, and oil paintings . . . disposed of at the same place and in the same way. There s a whole world of literary memories environing the name of Bentley. The novels we read and enjoyed so much in youth; the serial whic h seemed to our schoolboy judgment the wittiest, the wisest, and the most chamingly illustrated in the world; the delicious, hot-pressed, broad margined books of travel or of auto-biography which gave rise to such hot competition at the Book Club or lending library; the charming uniform edition of novels which were the forerunners of the still cheaper reprints which crowd the railway bookstalls now;—all come to mind when the name of Bentley is pronounced. Mr Foster has revived the story concerning the relations between Mr Charles Dickens and the famous publisher, but to most people who care for literature it was a familiar fact that the author of "Pickwick" once edited Bentley's Miscellany, and that he retired from this post at his own desire. The remonstrance addressed to the publisher when the periodical was first spoken of, and it was designed to call it the Wits' Miscellany, on the ground that this title was too pretentious; and afterwards, when it was decided to give it the name by which it became famous, Bentley's Miscellany, the joke against him, that "he need not have gone to the opposite extreme," seemed to gain new life yesterday, when the thirty volumes, with illustrations by George Cruikshank and Alfred Crowquill, "Very early impressions," were put up, and, after a brisk competition, sold for £6 17s. 6d.

The lots which are to be offered to-day and to-morrow speak most strongly of the busy active life of the successful publisher, and of his personal relations with the men of genius of his time. Among these, Dickens, of course, stands pre-eminent. "The first etter I had from him," continues Mr Foster in another chapter, "was at the close of 1836, from Furnival's Inn, when he sent me the book of his opera, Village Coquettes, which had been published by Mr Bentley." The "remainders" of this publication were to be seen on Messrs Sotheby's shelves yesterday, with many another book of special interest. Three quarto volumes, handsomely bound in Russia leather, and inscribed "Harold," were the original manuscript of Lord Lytton's historical romance of that name; and the fair Edith and the gallant, wise-headed, ill-fated Harold, the feeble Edward, and the arrogant Norman were all conned over in the very guise in which they fell from the author's hand and brain. The voluminous letters of Hayley, the poet, to the Rev. Dr John Johnson, the editor of Cowper's "Homer," dated in the early part of this century, and already yellow with age, are bound together, and were undergoing rigorous scrutiny from a grey-haired gentlemanly bookworm, who succeeded in convicting Hayley of several undue abbreviations, and of other epistolary liberties with the English tongue. One of the things which makes a sale like that in progress interesting is the fact that men with special hobbies, or with special knowledge crowd to it, and exercise them upon what is offered. The elderly ex-publisher, who was a contemporary of Mr Bentley for many years, reminded one a little of the picture of Cromwell studying Charles I. in his coffin, by the inquiring energy with which he ferreted out and examined the relics which have the strongest bearing upon the late publisher's individual taste. There were other people waiting their turn for a peep into the original of Sir Nathaniel Wraxall's Memoirs, and strangely cramped and formal the handwriting appeared in which all the gossip and scandal were recorded. The Log-book of Prince Rupert attracted another knot of curious students; and half-a-dozen of Fenimore Cooper's novels, including The Pathfinder and The Deerslayer, all interleaved and with emendations in the author's hand, were studied closely by men to whom Leather-stocking was the beloved hero of their youth.

In truth, the whole collection is pregnant with suggestiveness. The stranger opens a copy of a work illustrated by Alfred Crowquill, and, presto! a faded note drops out which has, perhaps, never before seen light since it was written by the artist. It is to "Dear Miss Bentley," and is a simple request that "you will ask your pa to have the book noticed in the next number of the 'mag.'" Mrs Inchbald's sprawling handwriting, and her play, A Case of Conscience, set one thinking of that brave woman's working life; and then, in rapid succession, a jovial figure with a bushy beard and a laughing eye is smoothing the one with a shapely hand, and giving point to a comic saying by expressive glances from the other. You hear once more the engineer's story, and hear the sound from his wonderful wooden pipe; the diligence is again crammed with tiny dolls to illustrate how closely the vehicles of which it is a model can be packed; there is laughter on all sides in the Egyptian Hall, and Albert Smith is delighting young and old with the ever-so-many-hundredth exhibition of Mont Blanc. For Mr Ledbury, the hero of the Islington bath, is here in his original pen-and-ink dress, side by side with the "Adventures of the Scattergood Family," and many a stray story and descriptive essay written for the Miscellany in the old days. "We are all dead now!" once wrote Sydney Smith, and the bound volumes of pamphlets, with their titles, take one again to different interests and another world. Mr Bentley appears to have interested himself greatly in the collection of miscellaneous literary odds and ends. "North American Indians who have visited London" is the title of one book of newspaper cuttings and portraits; and this is only one out of many scrap-books and bound volumes of a character strangely mixed. Here are a series of thick, handsome books, with "Pamphlets" inscribed on their stout calf, and a list of sub-titles, the gold lettering of which covers their sides. Take up the first of them, and what can be more heterogeneous than the list of contents given on its back? Reports from the International Commission appointed to report upon the navigability of the Upper Nile, dated Assouan, 1855; a form of prayer recommended for use during a period of national affliction; answers from Mr Ferdinand de Lesseps to an Edinburgh reviewer who seems to have explained that the Suez Canal was an impossibility; and "Correspondence between Thackeray and Yates." There has been surely a touch of eccentricity in the phase of "collecting;" or is it that his possession of the pamphlets collected by Evelyn, the antiquary, gave Mr Bentley his taste for out-of-the-way specimens of nineteenth century publications? The Evelyn series is as heterogeneous as anything preserved by the modern London publisher, as the very title of the works composing it show. They are all well bound in drab calf, and range from the Brief and perfect Journal of the late Proceedings and Successes of the English Army in the West Indies (1655), to Room for the Cobler of Gloucester and his Wife; with several Cartloads of Abominable, Irregular, Pitiful, Stinking Priests. There are, too, A Tongue Combat betweene two English Souldiers; Stubbes' Cristal Looking-glasse for Christian Woman; His Majestie's (Charles First's) Message concerning Sir John Hotham's Refusall to give His Majestie entrance into his Towne of Hull; Mr Goodwin whipt with his own Rod; a True Account of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, and many others equally quaint and equally varied or opposed in spirit and substance.

But it is past one p.m., and the auctioneer, who is a quarter of an hour late, mounts the rostrum, and the bidding goes on smartly. Mr Bentley's oil paintings look on doggedly from the opposite wall, as their late master's cherished effects are rapidly distributed at good prices; and one thinks how different are scenes they have witnessed from that now taking place at the bare and narrow mahogany tables below them. The brilliant staff of Bentley's Miscellany, as it was in the old days, and many another writer of genius, have shared their publisher's hospitality, depend upon it, and have made merry under the canvass presentments which look into vacancy with such persistency now. Mr Bentley's walking-sticks, again, in two lots, speak of friendly strolls, during which terms were being settled between author and publisher; and whether we turn from the books to the autographs, or from the pamphlets to the portfolios, the story is the same—that of a long and active life spent amid the best literary talent of its time.

WEISBADEN.—Herr Grammau's three-act romantic opera of Melusine is in rehearsal.

TURIN.—Sig. Bonili has succeeded Sig. Corti in the management of the Teatro Regio. He will produce Lauro Rossi's new opera of Cleopatra, in which Signora Giovannoni, Signori Patierno, Pantaleoni, and Nannetti sustain the principal parts. Spontini's Vestale is announced at the Vittorio Emmanuele.

PARIS SCRAPS.

(From our Parisian Scrapper.)

At the Grand Opera M. Faure was to have made his re-appearance, already retarded by indisposition, on Wednesday, the 22nd September, the part chosen by him being that of Hamlet, in M. Ambroise Thomas's opera of the same name. Mdlle de Reszké was to have been the Ophelia. But, instead of getting better, the patient grew worse, and on Sunday, the 19th, he was suffering from a severe attack of angina pectoris, so severe, indeed, as to fill his family and friends with grave apprehensions for his safety. Luckily, he has escaped, and is now on the high road to convalescence, but how long it will be ere he is able to resume his professional duties is a question which only time can answer. An other invalid is Mad. Carvalho, who has been obliged to take a short sick leave in consequence of hoarseness. There is nothing serious, however, about the attack, and she will shortly, it is hoped, be in a condition once more to take her place among her artistic colleagues.—[She has already taken it.—ED.]

Mdlle Krauss re-appeared, for the first time this season, in La Juive. On the Friday following she sang in Les Huguenots. Among the audience were Mad. Cornélie Richter, Meyerbeer's daughter, and her husband, Herr Richter, the celebrated painter.

Le Philtre is to be performed, in conjunction with the new ballet of Sylvia, by M. Delibes, but not, probably, before next year, as it is to be preceded by M. Mermet's Jeanne d'Arc, and no one is ever in a hurry at the Grand Opera. Another revival, as I have already announced, will be that of Le Comte Ory. Le Philtre will be thus cast: Fontanarose, M. Gailhard; Guillaume, M. Vergnet; Sergeant, M. Lassalle; and Thérésine, Mad. Carvalho. The cast of M. Mermet's opera will include M. Faure, Charles VII.; M. Gailhard, Richard; M. Salomon, Gaston; Mdlle Krauss, Jeanne; and Mad. Carvalho, Agnès Sorel. The other characters will be sustained by MM. Battaille, Menu, Mermant, Sapin, and Auguez. The character of Isabella de Bavière has been cut out.

M. Couturier will make his début, in Guillaume Tell, in the early part of October. He belongs to the military contingent of the present year, but has obtained twelve months' grace from the Minister of War.

It was M. Halanzier's intention to give, this winter, a series of masked balls, which were to have surpassed in magnificence and splendour anything of the sort ever known, but the whole scheme has fallen through. The Managing Board of the Assistance Publique required, for the droits des pauvres, 25 per cent., not only on the profits, but also on the expenses, and M. Halanzier, considering the claim exorbitant, resolved to give no balls. But, if M. Halanzier cannot agree with the gentlemen of that respectable but grasping body, the Assistance Publique, he is on excellent terms with the members of his Chorus, who, in consideration of his having recently raised their salaries a fifth, invited him, the other day, to a grand banquet, characterised by good feeling, spirited speeches, and, to use a forcible, though rather vulgar expression, no end of champagne.

At length it seems we are really to have a real novelty at the Grand Opera. The new opera of Dimitri, by M. V. Joncières, has got beyond the point of mere acceptance, and has been tried, no one being present save the manager and his leading officials. For this reason I can tell you nothing from my personal knowledge. I will fall back, therefore, on the subjoined extract from the Ménestrel, whose contributor, by the way, was not more lucky, as regards obtaining admission, than myself:—

"The choral portion of Dimitri is said to have produced the best possible impression. An oriental kind of march is especially mentioned as highly successful; the managerial areopagus, who alone were present at the hearing, appeared charmed, also, with a melodious melopœia for Dimitri on his arrival before Moscow. This tenor song, wafted on the continuous sound of bells, produced all the greater effect, because there is revealed beneath the rhythm of the bells a most happily conceived, although most studiedly refined, accompaniment. There is nothing of the Wagner school. Several other pieces, likewise, gave evidence, we have heard, of melodic and dramatic qualities of the first order. As for the ballet airs, performed four-handed by the composer and M. Croharé, we have been told they are ravishingly beautiful. Such are the impressions of those behind the scenes. We simply repeat them, for neither we nor anyone else formed part of the areopagus in question, which, we repeat, consisted exclusively of the manager and the heads of the different departments under him."

Mdlle Chapuy has appeared at the Opéra-Comique, with undoubted success, as Isabelle in Le Pré aux Clercs. Another interesting fact at the same theatre was the re-appearance of Mad. Galli-Marié in M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon.

M. Léon Escudier will conduct his venture under the title of the Opera Ventadour, by which means he will be able to represent French Opera with as much propriety as the works of an Italian master. Meanwhile, it is reported that the theatre has been taken for a short term by M. Duprat. That gentleman is said to intend introducing to the Parisian public his Pétrarque, which has made such a hit at Marseilles, Avignon, and Toulouse. Should the work be produced here, the principal parts will be sustained by Mdlle Marimon, Mad Arnaud, and M. Morère.

M. Victor Massé's Paul at Virginie has been withdrawn from the Opéra-Comique, and will be produced, on the 25th October, at the Gaîté. M. Capoul will still be Paul, and Mdlle Heilbron, Virginie.

It is possible that a posthumous, four-act opera, Riquet à la Houppe, music by Grisar and words by M. Thomas Sauvage, will shortly be played in Brussels. There is the following note written by the composer himself, in 1869, very shortly before his death: "Wanted by M. Perrin for the Opera." ("Demandé par M. Perrin pour l'Opéra.") Among the numerous unpublished scores left by Grisar there are two more which were destined for particular theatres: L'Oncle Simon, a three-act comic opera, with words by M. Emile de Najac, for the Paris Opéra-Comique, and Le Parapluie enchanté, a three-act buffo fairy opera, words by MM. Emile de Najac and Charles Deulin, which was to have been brought out at the Bouffes-Parisiens.

[Omitted last week for want of space.—ED. M. W.]

October 7, 1875.

The same titles: Les Huguenots, Faust, and La Juive, still figure in the bills of the Grand Opera. In the last-named work, Mdlle Krauss, who is again ill, has again been under the necessity of ceding the part of Rachel to Mdlle Mauduit. Faure is still on the sick-list, that is to say: he is better than he was, but no one can fix any date for the resumption of his professional duties.

M. Campo-Casso has at length followed the example set him by M. Arsène Houssaye, and, not being able to find a home for the Théâtre-Lyrique, has resigned what I may be allowed to call his managership in partibus. He thus announces the fact in a letter, addressed to M. Prével, and published in that omnium-gatherum, the Figaro:—

"MY DEAR MONSIEUR PREVEL,—Honoured by the confidence of the Minister, who was kind enough to bestow on me the management of the Théâtre-Lyrique, I considered it a duty not to resign that management till I had done all that was humanly possible to find a theatre. I have not been able to succeed, despite of all my efforts. I cannot pursue an enterprise leading to no practical result, and I now write to inform you that I have sent in to the Minister my resignation as manager of the Théâtre-Lyrique. Allow me, my dear Monsieur Prével, to avail myself of the hospitality of the Figaro for the purpose of thanking those who, in this matter, have honoured me with their good-will. Among them I include M. Halanzier, from whom I experienced the most loyal sympathy. I remain, etc. "CAMPO-CASSO."

So much for Buckingham-Campo-Casso. Who is to succeed him? Who is to be the next aspirant to the shadowy managerial throne? Rumour asserts that the coming man is M. Albert Vizentini, and the Entr'acte, acting as Rumour's mouthpiece, says:—

"Thus, the thing is settled. We must not reckon upon a Théâtre-Lyrique this year. Yet, despite M. Campo-Casso's resignation, composers do not appear greatly discouraged. Now that it is certain that M. Campo-Casso has retired, we may state the course to which those interested have agreed. It is simply to invest M. Vizentini, the manager of the Gaîté, with the rights that M. Campo-Casso has renounced. M. Vizentini is perfectly willing to accept the mission. Anyone might easily have surmised this, on seeing him appropriate M. Victor Massé's opera of Paul et Virginie, engage Capoul, Madlle Heilbron, Devoyod, etc. M. Vizentini possesses an orchestra, a chorus, and a theatre situate in the centre of Paris. He will not have much to do to be in a position to work the patent of the Théâtre-Lyrique, as soon as he shall have fulfilled his engagements with the authors of the fairy pieces in preparation. Let him persist in this project, and, as we said a few days since, without then choosing to give any further explanation, the Théâtre-Lyrique will at length become a reality."

How far the above is based upon fact, and how much it is indebted to the imagination of its writer I cannot take upon me to decide.

La Fille du Régiment was played on Wednesday, the 29th September, at the Opéra-Comique for the six hundredth time, having been first produced there on the 11th February, 1840, when the principal parts were "created" by Mesdes Borghèse, Boulanger, Blanchard, MM. Marié, Henri, and Ricquier.

Le Val d'Andorre is definitely announced for the 10th inst., but managerial announcements are not always strictly carried out; like promises generally, they appear to be leavened by a good deal of the proverbial pie-crust element. Then will come the turn of Le Piccolino, by MM. Sardou and Guiraud, which is already being studied. Report speaks well of the music.

La Filleule du Roi, first produced by M. Humbert at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, Brussels, is to be brought out shortly at the Renaissance. The day fixed is the 12th inst., but the same remarks I have just made in reference to the Val d'Audorre apply here. The composer, M. A. Vogel, has written, also, the three-act opera, La Moissonneuse, represented with tolerable success at old Théâtre-Lyrique, the Nid de Cigogne for Baden, and, at the express desire of the King of Holland, an heroic opera entitled Le Siège de Leyde, for the Theatre Royal at the Hague.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

Herr Simon, from the Stadttheater, Stettin, has appeared at the Royal Operahouse as Lyonel in Herr von Flotow's opera of Martha. He possesses an agreeable voice, but it is no more calculated to fill so large a building than a thin slice of bread and butter is capable of filling the stomach of a healthy ploughman after a hard morning's work in the furrows. In a concert room—a small concert room—Herr Simon may be a desideratum; at the Royal Berlin Operahouse he is a mistake. The remaining characters were in the hands of Mdlles Grossi, Lammert, Herren Krolop, and Barth.

Another failure has been that of Herr Kannberg as Arnold in Guillaume Tell. Like Herr Simon, Herr Kannberg may be all very well in a concert room, but he does not figure to advantage on the stage. Commenting upon his performance, the Berlin Echo seizes the occasion to make incidentally a few observations which agree so completely with what I have said, over and over again, concerning the system of allowing novices and beginners to air their immature powers on the boards of large theatres, that I cannot refrain from quoting what it says:

"Herr Kannberg sings correctly and with musical intelligence, but he does so without high training, and, more or less, naturalistically. If the Royal Operahouse must be assigned him as the arena to test his powers—a course of which it is impossible to approve—he ought to have appeared in parts such as Tamino, Ottavio, and Pylades, not as Florestan, Arnold, and, as we have reason to dread, Masaniello. We hope, however, that after this Arnold the Management of the Royal Operahouse will have had enough of the cruel experiment. Herr Kannberg has yet to learn how to walk and stand, gesticulate and act, and, first and foremost, sing. Even when he shall have done all this, we shall not be justified in expecting anything great from him. But to teach these things is not the mission of a first-class theatre."

Herr Kannberg was supported—and he needed all the support he could get—by Mdlle Lehmann, as Mathilde; Mdlle Horina, as Gemmy; Mdlle Lammert, as Gertrud; Herr Krolop, as Melcthal; and Herr Fricke, as Walther Fürst.

Herr Niemann has been suffering from total extinction of the voice, consequent on hoarseness. The fact has given rise to all kinds of reports unfavourable to the singer, and they seemed to be corroborated by the fact that Herr R. Wagner has been endeavouring to find another representative of Siegfried in the Nibelungen-Tetralogical-Trilogy, a fact, however, which simply proves that there was more truth than Herr R. Wagner chose to admit in the reports of misunderstandings at Bayreuth between Mad. Cosima and various artists, including, perhaps, the costumier of the Theatre Royal, Munich. The part has been offered to Herr Müller, of the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, who, with strange want of appreciation, has declined the honour. Under the circumstances, it is probable that Herr Vogl, of Munich, will be the stopgap.

Cagliostro, announced as "an operetta in three acts, by F. Zell and Rich. Genée, with music by Johann Strauss," has been produced at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater. For "operetta," read comic, or rather buffo, opera. At the first few performances the new work did not prove particularly attractive, but it has since filled the theatre night after night. The music is sparkling and agreeable without being anything extraordinary. The most taking piece on the first night was a "Waltz-Duet" in the second act. The cast included Mesdlles Dossi, Schirmer, E. Schmidt, Herren Swoboda, Brandt, and Bollmann. The mise-en-scène generally was good.

Professor Stern intends celebrating, on the first November, the 25th anniversary of the existence of the "Conservatorium der Musik" under his direction. From a pamphlet recently published in anticipation of the event we learn that:

"The Conservatory was founded on the 1st November, 1850, conjointly by Dr A. B. Marx, Herr Theodor Kullak, Pianist to the Court, and Herr J. Stern, Royal Music-Director. Kullak seceded in 1855, and A. B. Marx two years later, leaving the institution under the sole direction of Herr Stern, who, in 1860, was created a Royal Professor. Leaving out of consideration a present of 1,000 thalers from his Majesty the Emperor, for building repairs, the institution has had to be self supporting, though stipends from generous benefactors have repeatedly been granted to needy pupils of unusual talent. According to the testamentary directions of the late Herr Meyerbeer, Music-Director-General, Stern's Conservatory is one of the Prussian Musical Schools of which the pupils are entitled to compete for the Meyerbeer Travelling-Studentship of 1,000 or 1,500 thalers. Of the three stipendiaries, whom the trustees have selected up to the present time, two belonged to this institute, which, from the 1st November, 1850, to the 1st September, 1875, has been attended by 3,146 students. Among the teachers during the above period were the following artists, some of whom bear highly celebrated names: De Ahna (violin), H. v. Bülow (piano), Berndal (elocution), Louis Brassin (piano), L. Ehlert (piano), H. Ehrlich (piano), Dr Ed. Frank (piano), Moritz Ganz (violoncello), Flod. Geyer (counterpoint), F. Kroll (piano), Friedr. Kiel (composition), Kahle (elocution), Kullak (piano), Löschhorn (piano), Laub (violin), Lührss (composition), A. B. Marx (composition), Jenny Meyer (singing), Otto (singing), Reissmann (musical history), Rust (composition), J. Stern (singing), Schnackenburg (Italian), Schubert (clarinet), Bernhard Scholz (score-playing), Hugo Ulrich (composition), Jean Vogt (piano), Ch. Wehle (piano), W. Wieprecht (orchestral conducting), R. Wüerst (theory), Weitzmann (composition), Willmers (piano), and Zimmermann (violin)."

Several complaints were recently made concerning the state of neglect into which Aug. Conradi's grave had been allowed to fall. These complaints have had a satisfactory result, for the managing boards of the "Asylverein" and of the "Verein gegen Verarmung und Bettelei" have caused the grave to be put in proper order. In acting thus, they have done no more than their duty, which they ought to have done long since, for Conradi left behind him a by no means inconsiderable sum, which has gone—though why or how I am unable to say—to the institutions in question.

St Petersburgh.—The Association for Chamber Music have just issued their annual report for 1874-5. They gave 14 regular, and 2 extra concerts. They performed 60 works, by thirty different composers, 8 of these works being by composers resident in Russia. The association numbers 196 members. Two (Louis Maurer and Anton Rubinstein) are honorary members; 90 effective; 104 non-effective.—Herr Johann Strauss's Reine Indigo, is about to be performed with Mdlle Nordet, of the Opéra-Comique, as Fantasca.

Gratz.—A grand concert was given in the Stadttheater during the meeting of the Natural Science Congress. It began with Weber's "Jubel Ouvertüre." To this succeeded Beethoven's violin Concerto, played by Herr Johann Lauterbach. Dr Em. Krauss, from Vienna, sang songs by Brahms, Franz, and Schumann. Then Herr Lauterbach played Spohr's "Adagio" and Schumann's "Abendlied." The other numbers were Engelsberg's chorus for male voices, "Waldesweise" (by the Gratz Männergesangverein and Akademische Liedertafel), and Schumann's Symphony in D minor.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Hic Hæc.—Hock.

Théophile Victor Gautier Vivier Hugo Grotius.—"Assurement."

Bullfinch.—Our correspondent confounds the Nightingale with the Mavis. Fi donc!

Dilettante.—Tasca De Capellio and Sparapani. "Dilettante" has been misinstructed.

Dr Grub.—The "Demon" of Socrates was his own conscience. Socrates never composed a fugue.

Jonathan Duckworth.—There are only two honorary members of the "Société de Musique de Chambre" at St Petersburgh—Louis Maurer and Anton Rubinstein.

Dr Bridge.—The question had better be addressed to the Princess Dolgourouky, who, though she could not vie with Samson in the "carrying of gates," would excel him in the throwing of bouquets.

J. L. C.—Inquire of Messrs Ashdown and Parry, Hanover Square. The "Bibliothèque Classique" was originated at their house, in 1842. The pianoforte arrangements, for four hands, of Spohr's Symphony in D minor, and G. A. Macfarren's Symphony in C sharp minor, are in the catalogue.

Dr Jury.—Certainly not. Auber wrote another opera after the Premier Jour de Bonheur. On every other point Dr Jury is wrong. The quartet of Auber, left unfinished, was never played in public. Dr Jury is thinking of the pianoforte trio, "Op. 1," originally published at Lyons, which Auber himself had forgotten.

Floff-and-Fluss.—The definition of our correspondent would seem to apply rather to the imitators of Mendelssohn than to the imitators of Weber—Marschner. We shall, nevertheless, be glad of his promised letter. "Floff-and-Fluss" is wrong about Zumsteeg; he confounds that composer, who wrote the Geisterinsel, with another composer who did not write the Geisterinsel.

Abel Quick.—Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore is a charming opera; but Auber's Philtre is worth two of it. Verdi's Ballo in Maschera is a charming opera; but Auber's Gustave III. is worth two of it. In each instance—Auber and Donizetti, and Auber and Verdi—the same plot was treated; and it must be confessed, looking at the results, that the Frenchman was more than a match for the two Italians rolled into one. Mr Quick is wrong in supposing that the Italians preceded the Frenchman. On the contrary, the Frenchman was the original in both cases.

A Young and Anxious Conductor.—We have repeatedly warned correspondents to pay no attention either to the theories or the æsthetics of Dr Serpent. It is impossible for a composer to indicate exactly, by any words or signs, the time in which he wishes a piece to be executed. The music must always, to a certain extent, speak for itself, and much should be left to the feeling and judgment of the conductor, whose business it is to study the score, even to the minutest details, and imbue himself thoroughly with its spirit. If Dr Serpent asserts the contrary, he does so in ignorance.

Dr Smooth.—Yes. Socrates was wise, and Aristides was just; and to these undisputed axioms might be superadded a third axiom in favour of the directors of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace. These directors are both wise and just—wise because they stick to their colours; just because they are not simply eclectic by temperament, having a large receptivity for all artistic productivity, but because they sympathise with "oppressed nationalities." Dr Smooth is wrong about Berlioz, whose overture, Waverley, was written before, not after, Les Francs Juges and Le Roi Lear.

ARABELLA GODDARD.

When thou didst play, it seemed to me
I never heard such strains before;
The music spoke unto my soul
Like tales of lofty classic lore.

Now plaintive, mournful, sad, and low,
Now grand, majestic, joyous, gay;
These thrilling notes move every heart—
O happy is who hears thee play!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—Anyone with only half an eye—scant allowance even for a Cyclops—must, at some period or other of his existence have noticed, in the streets of London, the sudden appearance of a number of persons differing in many distinctive characteristics from the ordinary passengers around them. They generally crop up about six o'clock p.m., or a little before that hour, and stream singly, in couples, or in threes and fours, through the usual metropolitan crowd till half-past six or so, when the supply seems all at once cut off from the main. They do not belong exclusively to any one class, though they rarely are members of the lowest. Still more rarely, or, in fact, I might venture to say, never, have they aught in common with those darlings of fortune whose residences are in Belgravia or some equally aristocratic quarter, and whose doings are duly chronicled in the Morning Post or Court Journal, for the reverential perusal of Baker Street, Clapham Common, and other respectable and genteel localities. The persons to whom I allude invariably strike one as being in a hurry. They do not stop to look at performing birds; they pass, without heeding them, monkeys firing off guns and executing other martial evolutions; Punch himself, even when engaged in the reprehensible but amusing pastime of hitting his wife on the head severely and repeatedly with a thick stick, fails to arrest their progress; and not one of the usually attractive shops on either side of the thoroughfares they traverse can induce them to stand still and gaze for a single moment at the rich stores within. They are evidently bent on some errand too important to allow them to waste time. Yet, though there is a business-like energy and determination about their movements, it cannot be business which urges them on. They have faces far too smiling for that. The said faces, moreover, are in many instances very shining, as if recently subjected to vigorous friction supervening upon a liberal allowance of yellow soap. Some of the individuals to whom I am referring have, according to sex, a top-coat or a shawl hanging over one arm. Where can they all be going to? On what object have they set their hearts? They cannot be hurrying to get married? No! In the first place, the time of day is beyond the canonical hours; in the second, they bear no traces of misgivings in their features; and, in the third, the large preponderance among them of young members of the community, male and female, under nubile age, puts all ideas of orange blossoms and plain gold rings out of the question. Another fact connected with these exceptional pedestrians is that, in the neighbourhood of Parliament Street, besides resembling in other particulars their fellows elsewhere, they all converge towards Westminster Bridge, and boast of a striking proportion of groomy men, and a numerous contingent of heroes with abnormally elongated limbs, from Her Majesty's Regiments of Household Cavalry. "Ah!" says the reader, "I see! They are——"

Yes! They are. The persons whom I have been endeavouring to describe are all speeding upon one errand. They are all "going to the play!" Their destination may be the Haymarket, or Drury Lane, or the Lyceum, or the Gaiety, or, in the case of our friends from the stables and the barracks, Astley's—I beg pardon: Sanger's—but the theatre does not matter; they are not going, so to speak, to any theatre; they are "going to the play!"

People may, no doubt, be enthusiastic, but, of course, politely and fashionably enthusiastic—enthusiastic as becomes kid gloves and white chokers, and long trains and gorgeous opera cloaks—when they hear Adelina Patti, or listen to her fair colleague in art, Christine Nilsson; they may, just as assuredly, be enthusiastic with the proper moderation required by the nil admirari principle of good society, when they witness the performance of Mr. Irving as Macbeth or Mr J. S. Clarke as Major Wellington de Boots, but, for real downright enjoyment, commend us to the persons who "go to the play."

"Going to the play!" What recollections does that short phrase revive. Among our own contemporaries, "going to the play" was a great event, not prized for its rarity alone, like a cracked specimen of Henri II. china, or a unique copy, with only the frontispiece and a few intermediate pages wanting, of some editio princeps from the presses of Caxton, Jenson, or the Elzevirs, typographical worthies so dear to that eminent bibliopolist, Mr Bernard Quaritch, and his customers, but an event greeted with delight because as productive of downright bliss as an egg is proverbially reputed to be full of meat. It is true that with a few beings of a more than ordinarily susceptible disposition the very intensity of the enjoyment makes it closely resemble pain, just as extreme cold seems sometimes nearly allied to heat. I was acquainted with a youth whose transports were so great at the idea of "going to the play" that, for a considerable time previously, he could think of nothing else. He ate and drank, it is true, but he treated his food merely as a means of subsistence and not as a source of satisfaction as well. On the happy day itself, he began early in the morning paying periodical visits to an old-fashioned clock on the staircase to see how many hours, minutes, seconds, must elapse before the eventful moment of his departure. Until that moment arrived, benches, stools, chairs, and all such contrivances, were useless superfluities. How could he sit down? As well expect that prematurely shortened entity, a Cherub, to do so. Was not he "going to the play?" But, when he had attained the height of his ambition; when he occupied the much coveted seat in the pit; when he feasted his eyes upon that object of his adoration, the green curtain, his ecstacy still pursued the same suicidal course. He was so pleased with everything around him, so delighted at the treat in store, as to be utterly incapable of enjoying it. All he could do was to regret its fleeting nature. Though he heard the overture, his admiration of its beauties was drowned in the consciousness that it was over. He gazed at act after act of the play, but only to mourn its too speedy termination. As he was not contented till the curtain rose, he was wretched directly it had done so; he could think of nothing but the rapidity with which his pleasure kept drawing to its end. Luckily such cases as his are rare.

"Going to the play!" But, Valgame Dios, as Don Spaniard says, my recollections of the Past have rendered me forgetful of the Present. I have taken up so much space in introducing a few remarks which I desired to make, in addition to those I submitted to your approbation a few weeks since, concerning our London theatres, that unless you allow me to make them in some future issue of your paper, they must remain for ever in the chaos of the Unmade and the Unknown. N.V.N.

The Sultan.

WE read the following in the last issue of our excellent contemporary, The Graphic of the 2nd inst:—

"Mr J. L. Hatton, one of the most experienced and genial of our composers, to whom we owe 'Anthea,' the 'Hesperus,' and many other fine English songs, is going abroad for a lengthened period, with the view of completing, in unmolested quietude, an oratorio upon which he has been for some time engaged."

Here he is—bounding with life and vigour—ready to start upon his journey:—

Bon voyage!—J. L. Czapek Hatton;—and a speedy return—oratorio in hand! (This last is a sine quâ non).

TO DR FERDINAND HILLER.

REVERED ALTMEISTER,—I do not belong to the race of ontosophists; nor do I belong to the race of ontologists simple. Nevertheless (as you, Ferdinand Hiller, will bear me out), I am not a mere onocratalus, fed exclusively upon onobrychis. That is no reason why, because Wagnerism is to me Wagnerism, and nothing more, I should withhold from you a paper. Those who have missed perusing the books of the late Henry Fothergill Chorley cannot enter into their spirit, or propound their significance. Sain-D'Arod, however, to judge by the estimate of a great composer which but now, as one deeply versed in neurology (I may add neurotomy), he has given to the world, must have studied them intently.

A writer may be paracentrical, and yet escape scouting as a mock-moon with a paraplegia—because paraplegia does not immediately affect the brain. But admit all this; and what can the man of Bayreuth say to the sarmentous sarp-cloth of those who maintain that he is, at the best, a paranomasia? I leave it to the conjoint decision of Mr George Grove, Mr A. S. Sullivan, Mr E. Dannreuther, Mr Brinley Richards, and Mr Handel Gear. Let Sain-D'Arod, however, speak for himself, through the language of "J. V. B.," a still more eloquent though (unhappily) seldshown ruminator:—

If this be not an operant upon the Wagner theory, Mr Dannreuther will no doubt explain. I am firmly of belief that onomancy is one thing, and onomatopeia another, and that an indefinite quantity of ooze cast into an oost will never bring forth an ooroo. Let the tanners settle that question. It is not because the onycha is aromatic that it should be parent of the onyx, which is pellucid. "Rig" is the summit of a mountain. Let Herr Wagner, with the aid of his disciples, reach the summit of the mountain Jacob Meyer Beer (Ben Meyerbeer!) He failed to ascend Ben Berlioz; and in attempting the ascent of Ben Mendelssohn he hurt his patella grievously. The rifts were too much for him. "A frosty void" (Mendelssohn)—Ha! ha!—"Spectral bones and ribs" (Berlioz), &c.—What does it all mean? Lola Montez I can understand, inasmuch as she ridged the Jesuists; but the overture to Tannhauser, with nine billion trombones, would sikerly be too much by eight and a half billions. Meyerbeer was a starlin!—then Wagner must be a phenicopter. I have no patience with silver-beaters. There is not a vestige of robust strengthiness in them. What, after all, is a "palaver"?—Ask the King of Ashantee, or Captain Burton. A prophet may be streperous without stress, and a straw-worm is not of necessity a stray, be he never so streaky. I, for my own part, am tired of all this unbraced hissing. I would sooner eat a tareira, uncooked, than hold parley with a tareiboia. In the consideration of such questions, however, it is better not to assume the air of a tantling, and move (as if forefated) tardigradously. The tapera, best esteemed among Brazilian swallows, flies swiftly and feeds its young, a hundred gnats the second. Why, then, such abundance of slow talk and lecturing?—The Druids called Jupiter, not Jupiter, nor even Zeus, nor even Jove—but Taranis. John Oxenford, Esq. can vouch for that. Targovisco, nevertheless, was at one period a Turkish town of some importance. What boots it if a certain fish be called sea-tench (turdus, wrasse, or Tinca Marina?) Mr Lloyd, of the Crystal Palace, or Mr Leopold Lewis, of the Savage Club and the Brighton Aquarium, will answer—"It boots nothing." Richard Wagner would scarcely affect to be hailed as a tit, or fermellette;—then wherefore endless tittering and twittering?—Jupiter was also entitled Tamarins, and the great Tityus (once caught titubating) was Jupiter's son by Eleara; but although Tityus composed operas he did not build and populate a city, with streets, houses, and bantlings. After all, the Tlanquatzin is not to be found elsewhere than in the United States. All hail opossum! Tivy—Tivy! Mr Burnand could tell us something from his room at the Horse and Stamps—but he wont. A human being (like C. A. B., or W. B.) may unbuckle and yet not be unbenummed. Meyerbeer lacked the good fortune to be "set to music by Verdi," as a great Moravian critic says of Nebuchadnezzar-Wagner.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

WRITING to the Guide Musical, M. Arthur Pougin, the well-known musical critic, announces that M. Hervé is working on a grand three-act piece, of which he will furnish both the words and the music. M. Arthur Pougin makes this announcement under the heading of "Unpleasant News" (nouvelles facheuses). M. Arthur Pougin is evidently a mad wag.

THE late Dr Härtel of Leipsic has bequeathed to the Pauliner Library attached to the University a portrait in oil colours of Lessing, the father of German literature, and a valuable manuscript book containing Goethe's first twenty pieces of poetry, written in 1767, and published in 1768. The manuscript, in Goethe's hand, contains, also, the music composed to the poems by Bernhard Theodor Breitkopf, son of Cristopher Breitkopf, originator of the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, and bears date: 1770.

MDLLE CAMILLO URSO, the violinist, was at one time giving concerts with Tom Karl, at South End, U.S. Why, in the name of Heliogabalus, don't Tom Karl invade our shores? Tom not being a pianist, there is little chance that "J. W. D." will wind his horn on Dover Cliff—as Herr Mustard, of the Leipsic Signale, once historiographed. It is very hard upon us Insularians to be deprived so long of Tom Karl. "Karley is my darling" might be sung on the much desired, though mucher expected, occasion. Come then, Tom—don't be a self-denying Karl.—A. S. S.

OUR revered contemporary, Le Saison de Boulogne-sur-Mer, in a recent issue kindly points out to English visitors at the "Etablissement" how they can see an unusually fine collection of pictures. We subjoin the friendly paragraph, verbatim et literatim:—

"We feel much obliged to give notice to the amators of this town, that a splendid collection of old and modern paintings will be exhibited in the gallery Pelletier, no 17, rue-Neuve-Chaussée, Saturday and Sunday 11th and 12th September from noon till five o'clock, in which place the action sale of that serious collection will be held on Monday 13th of same month at 2 o'clock afternoon by Mr Le Roy, auction-saler.

We may suggest that the literal rendering into English of "Commissaire-priseur" is not "auction-saler," but snuff-taking commissary. A. S. S.

Subjoined is an account, preserved in the Archives at Weimar, of the expenses of the Capelle, or Musical Establishment of the Saxon Electoral Court at Torgau, in 1524.

THE pecuniary results of the late Church Festival at Worcester Cathedral have been fully as satisfactory as had been anticipated. The following returns are furnished by Mr J. H. Hooper, honorary secretary:—The collections at the Cathedral (including about £120 from the interest of invested funds at Gloucester and Worcester) amount to £724 12s. 2d. The Supplemental Fund reaches £667 15s. 6d., including donations received since the Festival, making a total of £1,392 7s. 8d., to which it is possible some further additions may be made. There is also interest from Hereford to be received. Mr Hooper adds that the offertories at the Cathedral included £50 in notes (none exceeding £10) and £71 in cheques, none exceeding £25. All the rest was in gold and silver, except £2 4s. 9d. in copper. Lady Emily Foley, who has always been a most liberal patron and supporter of the Festivals of the Three Choirs, has sent a contribution of £50, to be added to the Cathedral collections, accompanying the gift with a letter, in which she expresses regret at the change made this year—"thus depriving the public of hearing and enjoying the grand compositions of the greatest masters in music to the utmost advantage—viz., in a cathedral, where the solemnity and grandeur of the building add so materially to the religious effect, the feeling of those who listen to the sublime music raising their thoughts to heaven and to the God who made them and redeemed them, when at the same time their ears and minds were instructed in the best manner for the enjoyment of the highest kind of music."

MUSIC IN AUSTRALIA.

(From our Correspondent.)

It is rather curious that the same month should witness the exodus of Miss Alice May with her English Opera Company, and the advent of perhaps the other most gifted operatic singer that has ever visited the colonies—Mdlle Ilma de Murska. Miss May and company leave by the mail which will bring this, on Tuesday next, for Bombay, Calcutta, China, and Japan, en route for California, where her company are expected. The journals are expressing great regret at losing this most popular cantatrice, and one whom Melbourne claims as its own, as it was here she made her operatic début. They say, "Such is the fortune, or rather misfortune, of the colony. Directly an artist arrives at a high position, and has gained our esteem and thorough appreciation, away he or she goes." To make an original remark, "Such is life!" But it is very natural to regret the loss of such an artist as Miss Alice May. Her appearance in India is looked forward to with much interest.

To-morrow night Mdlle Ilma de Murska will make her first appearance at a concert in the Town Hall, and there is but little doubt of her success vocally, but whether she will make a commercial success is another thing. People here care little for concerts, and as Ristori has the Operahouse for September, and the Williamsons have it till then, there is no possibility of Mdlle Murska appearing in opera for a considerable time. The wonderful success of the Williamsons is almost something to be ashamed of, and certainly does not redound to the taste of the people. Mr Williamson has some talent as an actor, but Mrs Williamson is simply a nigger minstrel or music hall singer, with some ability, but much more vulgarity. These good people were in receipt of some fifteen pounds a week in California, and were nobodies; they come here, and clear, in a few months, much more than any artist who ever visited us. Will Ristori do as well? I trow not! In Sydney she has had empty houses; but then the Williamsons were there!

BELLS AND BELL-RINGING.

MESSRS DUNCAN DAVISON AND CO.

GENTLEMEN,—You speak, in the issue of your Musical World, dated September 11, page 620, of a pamphlet called, "Practical Remarks on Belfries and Ringers," by Mr Bell. I should greatly like to see the pamphlet; and if you will put me in the way of getting it—I cannot find it here—I shall be greatly obliged.

Geneva, Sept. 22nd, 1875. M. M. E. L.

[Enquire of Bell and Daldy.—ED.]

THE NEW OPERAHOUSE.—Great progress during the last three weeks has been made with the new Operahouse on the Thames Embankment. Mr Francis Fowler, the architect, has lately visited the great theatres, with the intention of introducing any new feature which might add to the safety, convenience, or excellence of the new Operahouse. He has visited St Petersburgh, Moscow, Berlin, Vienna, Trieste, Milan, Venice, Bologna, Naples, and Paris. In all these cities his plans for the new London Operahouse were inspected with interest. The architect and contractor (Mr Webster) assert that the new National Operahouse can be ready on the 2nd of May—the day originally named.

THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA.

(From the "Daily Telegraph," September 24.)

Mdlle Albani having sung "Let the bright seraphim," to the trumpet obbligato of Mr T. Harper, and obtained for the favourite piece a unanimous encore, The Woman of Samaria made its début before a Norwich audience, with Mdlle Enequist, Madame Patey, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Wadmore as soloists. Taking into consideration the fact that three numbers of Bennett's work were encored, and that the amateurs present heard it to the end with avidity, there can be no question as to the full acknowledgment of its merits. May we interpret this as a sign that one of the most beautiful compositions of recent years is about to receive the treatment some of us demanded for it at the outset of its career. But whether we may or may not signifies little. Continued neglect means much to the man of genius who dies, perhaps, without a consciousness of reward; but so far his works are superior to himself. They can wait, for all the future is theirs, and because their day, which is sure to come, cannot come too late for its reward to be enjoyed. There are few examples of sacred music which better exemplify the reciprocal influence of art and religion than The Woman of Samaria. This cantata is like one of the temples reared by pious hands in the days when men built "to the glory of God" first, and to their own honour and profit next. It is uncompromising in its severe dignity and abstract purity, yielding nowhere to a desire for mere applause, and disdaining to cater for the greed of personal vanity. In all this it is beautifully characteristic of the composer, to whom art was a sacred thing, having claims upon him he dared not fail to meet. Had Bennett chosen, he could have secured for his sacred cantata instant popularity; but this was not to him the highest reward, and he disdained to seek it. Well for us and for art that such men live to witness that even in this respect "life is more than meat." I need not enter upon a fresh discussion of the particular merits exhibited by Bennett's work. The task has been done often enough, and there only remains now to acknowledge certain very marked excellencies in the performance. The rendering by Madame Patey of the recitatives and the lovely air, "Lord, Thou hast searched me out," fell nothing short of perfection. The song had to be repeated; and in this case, at all events, the decree of the Mayor expressed a unanimous wish. Mr Lloyd obtained and deserved a like honour by singing "His salvation is nigh them," the third encore being given to "God is a spirit," the chaste and beautiful music of which recalled to some present the sad triumph of the day when its composer was laid to rest in Westminster Abbey. Sir Julius Benedict could not have laboured more zealously for the success of the work had it been his own.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Your last number of The Musical World contains a report from Copenhagen, in which my name is mentioned as belonging to Madame Trebelli's Concert Company, on a tour in Denmark. Permit me to say that since last March, when I was invited to play at the fourth grand orchestral concert at the Conservatoire, in Prague, I have never quitted England.—I beg to remain, Sir, yours truly,

"Der Mann, der uns ins Leben rief
Zu Tausenden, seht, er entschlief;
Und der von uns so hold erzählt,
Da liegt er bleich jetzt und entseelt!"—
So sprachen Elf und Engelein,
Und Nix' und Kobold stimmten ein:
"Auf! Lasst uns tragen ihn zugleich Empor ins ew'ge Märchenreich!"

MAYENCE.—The season opened with Gounod's Faust.

MUNICH.—Lord Byron's Manfred, with Robert Schumann's music, has been peformed at the Theatre Royal.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—The private choir of Mr James J. Monk, organist of St Saviour's Church, Falkener Square, gave a performance in the schoolroom, on Thursday evening, Sept. 30th, to a large audience. The programme comprised Schubert's Mass in G, Mr Henry Hiles' cantata, The Crusaders. Mendelssohn's Loreley, and Mr Arthur Sullivan's Trial by Jury. The performance was organised on a somewhat high level, but the success that attended it quite warranted the attempt. The performance of the concerted music, under the bâton of Mr Monk, showed careful training, the chorus being particularly good. The tenors however were rather weak in the upper notes, but the soprano voices were pretty good, and the solo in the "Crusaders" well deserved the hearty applause that followed. Mrs Connell presided at the pianoforte, and Mr W. D. Roberts at the organ. The acoustic properties of the building were not very favourable.—Liverpool Paper.

A BRIGHT FUTURE FOR ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—From time to time you have kindly published letters of mine, pointing out the advantage of a theatre attached to the Royal Academy of Music, so that those pupils who have an aptitude for acting should have the earliest opportunity of learning stage-business, combined with singing. By this means, Sir, we shall raise the standard of operatic actors—those who will know how to give force and power to their voice by their action; not, as too many of our English singers do now, stand like lay-figures, just moving a leg or an arm, and bringing out their notes as if they were singing in a concert-room, instead of representing a character full of energy and individual expression. It is said the New National Opera will have a school of this kind attached to it. Let us hope there will be no favouritism shown, and no experiments tried, by bringing out the young students before they are up to their work, which should be of a high standard. We know how much good aids the singer on in his work, and how much more he impresses his audience when able to express himself with his notes by suitable action. This ought to be learned when the pupil is young—when he is full of enthusiasm, and the mind susceptible of deep feeling, and can be trained in the right direction, which can be only done by constant study, and combining the two—acting and singing. I send you the engraving of the "opening of the Ballarat Academy of Music." What a reflection this casts upon us, to think, while our learned professors and princely patrons, with the rich amateurs, who talk so much and so learnedly upon the fine quality, and perfect intonation, &c., &c., of the great Italian and German singers, and foreign composers, have never attempted to raise their own countrymen and women to the highest standard as singers and composers, by careful and judicious early training. We have no end of money spent in prizes for "machine singing," but let us have a little of it spent for "operatic singing" and original English opera. We have plenty of talent, Sir, now, crushed down for want of encouragement, that would rise up, and let the world see that England has a soul for the divine art of music, as she has shown she has for painting, sculpture, and poetry. The students should be thoroughly impressed with the necessity of constant study, so many hours a day, as all the great foreign singers do. Unfortunately, our young singers think, as soon as they can sing Italian piece of music, and gain applause, that they are at the top of the tree, instead of just beginning to climb it. How many promising young artists have failed to realize the position that Joachim has predicted for them, in consequence of this morbid vanity, which has had a great deal to do with the decline of "English opera." But now she is again started into life, with energy and success, by that indefatigable of all musical directors, Mr Carl Rosa, who has the greatest desire, I hear, to encourage young English singers and original English opera, and to raise it to the position this great nation should take. Let author, musician, and singer set to work with the same energy that Mr Carl Rosa has done, and aid him in his good work, and depend upon it the public will not again let our national opera fall so low as to become a national disgrace.—Yours, &c., R. C.

PARMA.—It is said that a new opera, La Stella delle Alpi, by Sig. Bolzoni, will be produced here this autumn.

MASTER HENRI LOUIS BERGSON, son of Professor Michael Bergson, the pianist composer well known in London, gained "Le Grand Prix d'Honneur" for Rhetoric, at the completion of the Sorbonne (France), and, in consequence, had the honour of being invited to dine with the President of the Republic. It is twenty years since one so young (Master Bergson is only 15) obtained so important a prize. Mr Edmond About, the well-known author, gained it when about the same age.

Mdme Arabella Goddard a accepté la proposition de MM Strakosch, de se joindre à la tournée de concerts qu'ils organisent pour Mdlle Tietjens; elle terminera ainsi en société le tour du monde artistique, qu'elle s'était proposé de faire seule. Mdlle Tietjens est attendue dans très-peu de jours. De son côté Hans de Bülow donnera aussi des concerts dans les principales villes de l'Union. Il débutera par Boston et se fera entendre à New York en Novembre.—Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris.

An amusing little circular has just been issued by Wagner to the artists engaged for the four-day performance at Bayreuth next autumn. One short extract will explain its purport:—

"Will you, by a binding assent on your part, put it in my power to consider your co-operation as gained for the performance of my Stage-Festival-Play, and, at the same time, notify whether you require any remuneration, and, if so, to what amount. From the statement I have given you of the position taken by me towards the patrons of the enterprise, you will see that in the case of every one engaged, all thought of gain is excluded; nay, more, that self-sacrifice must invariably be pre-supposed."

In order properly to understand the sort of "self-sacrifice" referred to by Wagner, it is necessary to know that the artists are required to bind themselves down to work gratis, "in a truly companionlike association," throughout June and July for the rehearsals, and throughout August for the performances, that is to say, for three whole months. The new opera house has, we know, been built and furnished by voluntary subscription. On two or three occasions the faithful have grumbled at the expense, but all difficulties have invariably been overcome, and by hook or by crook the money has been forthcoming. We are told that the theatre holds nearly two thousand people, and we know that tickets for each of the four sets of performances cost £45. Now, if the chief artists are not to get a picking out of the proceeds, we should like very much to know who will.—CHERUBINO.

Richard Wagner, in his pamphlet, Ueber das Dirigiren, speaks of the late Cipriani Potter as a "genial old contrapuntist." Whether Potter was one of the "hungry contrapuntists" who seize on the "folks' melodies," as provender for the exercise of their sterile art, he does not say. It is a blessing for the "folk" that Wagner himself cares not greatly for counterpoint in the abstract.

The death of Marie Cico, the original heroine of Auber's Fiancée du Roi de Garbe, which occurred recently in Paris, will be heard of with regret by many who had the pleasure to know her, not only upon the stage, but "at home." "Marie Cico" was only her assumed name as a public singer. Her friends, and they are not a few, will remember her under another.

Mr J. Russell, of Covent Garden, has gone to Dublin to join the Albani-Zaré Thalberg provincial tour of Mr Gye and Sir Julius Benedict.

Miss Sophie and Miss Jessie Ferrari have returned to town from their visit to Balmoral.

The commemoration of the centenary of Spontini's birth, at Jesi, has been a great success.

Mdlle Albani has been singing at Brighton, where she was received with the accustomed fervour.

What is to be expected of the youth of America when a Boston paper speaks of "Mike Angelo"?

The organ appointment to St Peter's Church, Carmarthen, is vacant. The stipend is £70 per annum.

The police of Philadelphia have taken a Chew—David Chew; David took tobacco—stole a chew.

Madame Annie Essipoff has been engaged by Mr Arthur Chappell to play at the Monday Popular concerts.

Herr Jauner, manager of the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, has been nominated an officer of the Order of the Crown of Italy.

La Mandragone, a new comic opera in three acts, by Henri Litolff, is about to be produced at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, Brussels.

A telegram has reached London, reporting the brilliant success of Mdlle Tietjens at her first concert in Steinway Hall, New York.

Mr Josiah Pittman has gone to Dublin to join the Albani-Belocca tour. This said Josiah is welcome (thrice welcome) to all companies even where shawms are in request.

M. Bessel, founder of a Russian musical paper, is now in Paris, for the purpose of coming to an agreement with the music-publishers as to the right of French composers in Russia.

N. J. Countz, of Farmington, Mo., has raised a cucumber weighing twenty pounds. From all accounts it was a pretty big one, but he probably could have raised it if it weighed twenty pounds more, couldn't he?

Signor Tito Mattei has been specially engaged to play his new work for pianoforte and orchestra at the Alexandra Palace next month.

Mdlle Eugénie Coulon has returned from her continental tour. The Pyrenees, Biarritz, and Paris, were the principal places visited by the accomplished pianist.

Mad. Adelina Patti is at present in Paris, where she proposes remaining till the middle of next month. There is some talk of her singing at the Grand Opera for the benefit of the victims of the inundations in the South of France.

M. J. B. Singelée, violinist and composer (father of Mdlle Louise Singelli, the favourite operatic singer), died lately at Ostend. M. Singelée was born at Brussels in 1812. As chef d'orchestre he was well-known at Brussels, Ghent and Antwerp.

At a grand banquet given to the Duke of Edinburgh, during his recent visit to Russia, his hosts drank Queen Victoria's health by telegraph—"that is to say, in electric fluid, the nearest approach," remarks a New York editor, "they could get to Jersey lightning."

Mr Herbert Johnson and Mr W. C. Horsley are the two artists selected to represent the Graphic in India during the visit of the Prince of Wales. Mr Sydney Hall, one of the artists on the staff of the Graphic since its commencement, will accompany the Prince by invitation.

The Conservatory of Music at Buenos Ayres was solemnly inaugurated on the 17th June, 1875. M. Nicolas Bassi is the director. The course of instruction includes composition, the history of music, the piano, organ, violin, viola, violoncello, double-bass, wood wind-instruments, and solfeggio.

T. S. Mathis, of Ste. Genevieve, Mo., was milking a cow. The animal became restless and suddenly dropped dead. Mr Mathis took a rope from her horns and dropped dead also. He might have taken some better example than a cow to follow in such a serious matter as life and death.

Miss Emma Barnett has been making quite an impression in the provinces, where the youthful pianist has been "touring" with Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington. Her clever brother's fantasia on subjects from his cantata, "The Ancient Mariner," has been her Cheval de Bataille, and has proved eminently successful.

"He is as dead as a door-nail," coincided three Kentucky doctors, earnestly looking at Jack Thomas. "The blank he is," said Jack Thomas, as he rose in his shroud and put those doctors to flight. Doctors differ and patients die; when they agree patients come to life again, doubtless thinking the millennium has arrived.

M. Victor de Mirecki, who gained the first prize for the violoncello at the Paris Conservatory in 1868, and was a pupil of M. Franchomme, has been appointed solo violoncellist of the Royal Chapel, Madrid, and decorated with the Commander's Cross of the Order of Charles III. He was already a Professor in the Madrid Conservatory.

"Alexis," observes the Chicago Tribune, referring to the Russian Grand-Duke of the above name, "was thought to be something of a man when he visited this country. His entertainers were evidently mistaken in their estimate of him. He has consented to a divorce from the charming little lady he married in secret, and is now enjoying himself at home."

Mr Brinley Richards has returned from a visit to Lord and Lady Clarence Paget, at Plasllanfair, Anglesea. The new "Royal Albert Hall," at Newport (Monmouthshire), for oratorios and concerts, is to be formally opened on the 20th inst. Among the list of patrons are the Rev. Sir F. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Sir Robert Stewart, Professor Macfarren, and Mr Brinley Richards.

Two instances of mistaken cause and effect: James Taylor, of Argyle, N. Y., has an eight-day clock 45 years old, which keeps good time although it has never been taken apart. Of course; if it had been it would not keep time. There is a pair of Tennessee lovers who have loved for twenty-five years, and are not married yet. Of course, again; were they married they would not be lovers.

The project of erecting a statue at Dijon in honour of Rameau, has been revived after having long remained in abeyance. Some years ago M. Guillaume, a member of the Institute, prepared a model of the statue, the Municipality of the town assigned a site, and there the matter ended. The notion has now been taken up again, and it is possible that the statue may at length be completed and unveiled next year at a commemorative festival, similar to that recently celebrated at Rouen in honour of Boïeldieu.

Through the intervention of M. Oscar Comettant, it is said, M. Gounod has regained possession of the MSS. of several works of importance, which, through circumstances of strictly private character, had been detained in London; among them being Polyeucte, a grand opera in five acts, the first part of a Missa Solennis, and part of the score of an opera entitled Georges Dandin, founded on the comedy of Molière whose Medecin malgré lui M. Gounod had already used to excellent purpose.—Graphic.

Signor H. L. Bellini, sub-stage manager of the Royal Italian Opera, has accepted an engagement to sing the buffo part in a new opera about to be given at the St Carlo, Lisbon. Signor Bellini is well-known as a successful vocalist in London concert rooms; he possesses a good voice and a full knowledge of stage business. We read in the Commissioner's Journal that Signor Bellini has taken out a patent for a new method of constructing ceilings for theatres and halls, combining new principles of acoustics, ventilation, and lighting.

Dr Wiljalba Frikell has been astonishing the good people of Magdeburg. The Magdeburger Zeitung says of him: "Dr Wiljalba Frikell once more did everything that we can expect from a travelled artist. Novelty, originality, elegance, and finish, together with a witty and ready tongue, all combine to make the evening pass most agreeably. We look on with wonder, as everything is done so easily without tables or any other apparatus, and we are at a loss which to admire most, the performer's intellectual cleverness, his science, or his extraordinary dexterity."

"Our young folks who talk and write so serenely on the subject of matrimony do not touch upon the violent side of it. There is something worth studying in a list of matrimonial crimes. One man throws his wife out of the window; another starves his into obedience; half-a-dozen run away; a hundred dozen would if they could afford to; a wife poisons three husbands; a batch of wives skedaddle; in Danbury and Detroit they wield flat-iron and rolling-pin with equal skill and destructiveness; all the world over there is divorcing and being divorced. Start here, and then talk." Thus moralises a Transatlantic journalist—himself, doubtless, a married man.

Inspired by the almost unprecedented success of the Voyage autour du Monde, at the Porte St Martin, M. Vizentini is preparing, for the Gaîté, a Voyage dans la Lune. After a Voyage dans le soleil, which is not unlikely to be the next absurdity, we may probably (descending from big things to small) be treated to a Voyage autour de ma chambre, for which Xavier le Maïstre has left a suitable text; unless, soaring higher and higher, the adventurous travellers previously go to the fixed stars, Aldeboran, Arcturus, and Sirius, finishing up with Ursa Major.—Graphic.

The Richmond and Twickenham Times recently came across a catch of Dr Callcott's, the title of which ran, "Have you Sir John Hawkins's history?" The music is admirably set and full of humour, and the point of the "catch" consisted in the constant re-iteration of the words (sung by the third voice), "Burney's history," which were intended to convey the complimentary opinion that Sir John Hawkins's book might be consigned to the flames. We should like to hear of Mr Henry Leslie reviving this comical "catch"—it is short, it discusses quaintly and briefly the merits of the two histories which excited our forefathers' controversial spleen.

In the days of the late Monsieur Jullien there were uncharitable persons who did not hesitate to sneer at his talents as a conductor, to insinuate that that delicate ivory baton which still lives in the memory of the middle-aged playgoer was flourished in mere empty show, and had in fact no relation whatever to the actual business in hand in his magnificent orchestra. For them there was nothing imposing in that elaborate shirt-front of dazzling whiteness, that dress-coat with flowered lapels, flung wide with a show of negligence which was only art concealed; or even in that lofty brow and mingled air of severity and consciousness of power with which he would occasionally rebuke a lagging violin or an inopportune note from an absent-minded clarionet. Indeed, there is no denying that the harsh word "Charlatan" was occasionally applied to that enterprising Frenchman who contrived to become so prominent in the public eye some quarter of a century ago. Poor M. Jullien's right hand has now long ceased to wield the baton; but it is in no spirit of mere tenderness towards the departed that musical people who can remember those times have come to regard that pioneer in the field of musical entertainments for the many with anything but an unkindly feeling. There had been, it is true, promenade concerts before his day, but in comparatively small theatres, and in a feeble way. It was he who first exhibited faith in the power of good music at a low price to attract multitudes, at a time when the fashionable frequenters of the Opera had departed, and the ordinary theatrical entertainments were declining under the influence of fine weather and excursion trains. That there was some amount of trickery in his system must be admitted; but it should be remembered that he had to attract a public among whom musical taste was rare; and it was at least to his credit that he always ventured, and sometimes even further than was prudent, to mingle with his popular tunes and dances music of a far higher kind. It is doubtful, indeed, whether any man of his day did as much as Jullien to create, among those whose habit is to part with a shilling only for money's worth, a real love of musical entertainments.

Mdlle Zaré Thalberg has made a "hit" in Dublin. The critics express themselves delighted with her performance of Zerlina in Don Giovanni. Particulars next week.

M. and Madame Marchesi, the celebrated professors of the art of singing, have returned from Venice to Vienna, after paying a short visit to Verdi and his amiable lady at Busseto.

The Theatre hitherto known as the Alexandra, Park Street, Gloucester Gate, Regent's Park, is now undergoing the process of re-decoration, and will re-open on the 16th inst. under the title of the Royal Park Theatre. The Managers will be Messrs Parravicini and Corbyn, and the initiatory programme will consist of Offenbach's Geneviève de Brabant, with Miss Emily Soldene, supported by many members of the original cast.

The annual general meeting of the Aldermanbury Musical Society was held on Monday evening, prior to the commencement of its second season, in the Society's rooms, Oriental Buildings, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars; John Maxwell, Esq., in the chair. Nearly all last season's officers were re-elected, and upwards of 100 new members enrolled during the evening. The proceedings terminated with a selection of vocal and instrumental music by the members of the Society, ably assisted by Herr Lehmeyer.

When the Messrs Gatti announced a "Welsh Festival" at that popular autumn rendezvous Covent Garden, they probably did not anticipate the fierce heat of our new autumn weather or an evening faint with a tropical glow. It naturally occurred to these spirited entertainers that an evening in the Welsh mountains, the softening influence of the harp, the recollection of "The Bells of Aberdovy" and the presence of the Bride of Neath Valley would console the melancholy Welshmen in London for the loss of their beloved hills and vales. But, as it turned out, the inhabitants of Wales had not yet left their mountains, and the encouragement of the festival was left to a few benighted Englishmen who could not spell and would not dare to pronounce the titles of the songs or the names of the singers presented to their notice. When "Eos Morlais" and "Ap Herbert" came forward to delight their countrymen with queer barbaric ditties, the applause was not so enthusiastic as might have been expected; and even Miss Edith Wynne and her harp-tuned melodies scarcely succeeded in securing a patriotic glow for the music of Wales. Mr John Thomas, with his harp solos, his accompaniments, and his innumerable selections, never wearied in his attention to Welsh melody; but it was not until Signor Arditi, hitherto prostrated by the abnormal weather, and listening to the concert from his gilded chair, brought the full orchestra and brass band to bear upon "God bless the Prince of Wales," that patriotism came to the front. Then all the audience stood up and cheered. But there were other pleasures in store for the visitors who knew not Wales, and were puzzled with the mysterious language. * * * The abnormal atmosphere, weighted with a curious heat, naturally prevented any extraordinary demonstration in favour of the music of a romantic country; but supposing that it happens that another festival is given before the Welshmen have returned to town, it may be as well to consider if the melodies might not be given in English and the singers presented with names intelligible to popular audiences. Scotch songs are not presented in Gaelic. Irish melodies are translated so as to become intelligible to Saxon ears. Is it too much to hope that, at some future time, Miss Edith Wynne, "Eos Morlais," and the rest, will condescend to a language understood by the public for whom the concerts are designed? Failing this, a translation will be required for the programme, to say nothing of the songs, whose sentiment is denied to all but inhabitants of Wales.—THADDEUS EGG.

FRÜHLINGSNACHT.

(From the German of Eichendorf.)

O'er the garden, hear the voices!
Birds of passage on their flight!
Spring is coming, earth rejoices,
Grass is springing all the night.

Shouting now, and now nigh weeping,
Feel I that it cannot be!
Wonders of the Past come creeping
With the moonlight in to me.

And the moon, the stars, they tell it,
Dreamy forests lisp the sign,
Nightingales in sweet notes swell it:
"She is thine, is only thine!"

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

These Masses are published in a cheap form, in order to meet a growing demand for simple, melodious, harmonized music. In the cases where the register has been found too high for boys' voices, supplementary notes have been inserted.

They are thus adapted as well for Chancel Choirs, as for those in which the Soprano parts are taken by female voices.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The 20th series of these deservedly popular entertainments began on Saturday afternoon (the 2nd inst.) with a carefully selected, and for the most part very attractive, programme. The design and scope of the Crystal Palace concerts need not again be described. How they gradually assumed the form which has now long distinguished them; how, since Mr August Manns was appointed director of the orchestra, they have, step by step, reached the high position among our musical art institutions unanimously accorded to them; what good they have been the means of effecting for pure and healthy art through their strict and uncompromising adherence to a well-defined policy, is generally known and admitted among amateurs. To dwell further upon the subject would be to traverse old ground to little or no purpose. The scheme of the first concert may be quoted as a fair sample of what we are to expect, week after week, with but rare intermissions, during the ensuing autumn and winter months. The instrumental pieces were as subjoined:—

Overture, "The Naiads"	W. Sterndale Bennett.
Concerto for violin (first movement) ...	Paganini.
Symphony in C (No. 1)	Beethoven.
Notturno (violin)	Chopin.
Overture, "Der fliegende Holländer"	Wagner.

The welcome that greeted Mr Manns on taking his place at the conductor's desk was very cordial. There was no mistaking it for anything else than a sincere recognition of many years' arduous and conscientious labour in a praiseworthy direction. The performance of Sterndale Bennett's happily familiar overture made a commencement the promise of which was fully borne out by what came subsequently. The predilection of Mr Manns for the music of our gifted countryman has been repeatedly shown. That the first concert would open with one of Bennett's compositions might, under circumstances not requisite to explain, have been taken for granted. The concert last spring, devoted wholly to selections from works by the English composer, dwells still in the remembrance of his many admirers. Due honour was paid on that occasion to one whose fame has been legitimately earned. The overture called the Naiads—second of a trilogy, the first and third of which are Parisina and Die Waldnymphe—may compare with anything in its way for which we are indebted to modern art. The Naiads has always been a special favourite with connoisseurs; and this, bearing in mind the symmetry of its structure, the charm and spontaneity of its melodies, and the perfect style of their development, is not surprising. What Robert Schumann thought of it may be read in his published Gesammelte Schriften; what Mendelssohn thought of it no amateur need be told. We have seldom listened to a performance of the Naiads more evenly balanced than that of Saturday. Conductor and orchestra alike seemed resolved to make the audience understand and appreciate it; and the result was proportionate to the endeavour. With such scrupulously finished interpretation there can be nothing to prevent Bennett's concert overtures from occupying, by general assent, their appropriate place—side by side with the concert overtures of Mendelssohn.

Among other noticeable features of the 20th series of Crystal Palace concerts, we find the nine symphonies of Beethoven,—to be produced in chronological order. The symphony in C major ("No. 1"), as fresh and vigorous as when it first sprang from the brain of the "Jupiter of the Orchestra," was admirably played and created its never-failing impression. To the members of the Crystal Palace band this bright and sunny work, the inspiration of Beethoven's early period,—a prophecy, as it were, of the renown that awaited him in the Austrian capital,—is a book so freely open that they are scarcely called upon to turn over the leaves. They know every bar of it by rote. Each of the four movements, the Andante in F especially, instinct with primeval simplicity, and the "minuet"—so-called though virtually forerunner of the Beethovian orchestral "scherzo"—excited the audience in the liveliest manner. The applause was unanimous and long-continued. That the remaining eight symphonies will afford equal satisfaction there can be little doubt.

Herr Wilhelmj, by his execution of a movement from one of the concertos of Paganini, created a marked sensation. The characteristic qualities of this eminent violinist are familiar to amateurs. A tone more full and penetrating has seldom been obtained from the instrument; and this, accompanied by a phrasing broad and measured, a method well-nigh irreproachable, and a mechanical facility before which difficulties vanish, accounts for the estimation in which he is held by competent judges. Paganini's music, indeed, is of itself enormously difficult; but Herr Wilhelmj makes it still more difficult—so much so (witness his "cadenza") that ordinary players, however advanced, would scarcely make bold to attempt what in his hands appears child's play. The imperturbable calmness with which he masters feats seemingly impracticable, while exciting more or less astonishment among initiated hearers, leaves on the minds of the uninitiated merely a conviction that he who achieves thus much with no sensible effort might, if so inclined, achieve as much again with just the same facility. In his own adaptation of one of Chopin's Nocturnes for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, Herr Wilhelmj—with whom it is evidently a favourite—interpolates traits and embellishments which, however perfectly rendered, are hardly in strict keeping with music of so tunefully pensive a character—music which, like much that came from Chopin, conjures up dreams of the Æolian harp. At the same time, whatever is done absolutely well is tolerably sure to please; and Wilhelmj's Chopin was not less heartily applauded than Wilhelmj's Paganini. The quasi-inventor of these at one time undreamt-of complications would himself have been perplexed by many of the mechanical tours de force over which Herr Wilhelmj possesses unrestricted command.

The vocal pieces at this concert comprised an air from Mozart's Seraglio, sung, in English, by Mr Edward Lloyd; and another from Cosi fan Tutte, by Mdlle Cristino, a pupil of Signor Arditi's, who also introduced her professor's lively Tarantella, "Vispa son gentile;" Mr Lloyd contributing also M. Gounod's graceful ballad, "The Maid of Athens." The concert ended as stormily, as it had begun peacefully, with that orchestral prelude in which Wagner depicts the restless wanderings of the fate-struck Dutch navigator, against whom the elements are always raging, and the goal of whose aspiration is never reached until he meets with the woman of his dreams in the person of the mysteriously devoted Senta. A fine performance of this strange but extraordinarily impressive overture brought the whole to an effective climax.

NOBILITAS SOLA EST ATQUE UNICA VIRTUS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—I was scarcely justified, perhaps, in attaching a special significance to the revival, last summer, of Semiramide shortly after the production of Lohengrin. The chances are that the two events were not connected, either by manager or public, in the smallest degree. Semiramide has always been a popular work. Still, the conjunction of Rossini's opera and that of Wagner is suggestive, and supplied a text upon which a by no means tedious sermon might have been preached. I waived the sermon, and merely pointed out that the Rossinian revival was another proof—and a very practical one—of the fact that a long time must elapse before the Wagnerian cultus will exercise much direct influence upon the lyric stage in this country. Indirect influence it must necessarily have while modern composers (witness Gounod, in Roméo et Juliette) accept the teaching and, in part, copy the example of the author of Lohengrin; but the public, whose taste wields despotic power, cannot easily be seduced into new paths. That Lohengrin made a sensation is unquestionable; but I see no reason to believe that amateurs were affected by it to any appreciable extent. The old operas, against which Lohengrin is a protest, attract as much as ever; and if a disposition has been shown to put down certain absurd practices, such, for instance, as making a fuss over artists at the expense of the art they serve, the significant fact remains that the very works which offend most against Wagnerian theories are those most applauded when brought forward, "with new scenery, costumes, and appointments." This, however, will not discourage those who believe that Wagner, with all his extravagant exaggeration, is destined to make the lyric drama a nobler thing than it ever yet has been. Lohengrin, at any rate, has struck a doughty blow, and all that remains to do, as the late Mr Lincoln observed, is to "keep pegging away."—Yours in obedience,

Chidley Pidding.

CARL ROSA'S ENGLISH OPERA COMPANY.

The revival of Balfe's Siege of Rochelle is likely to prove of material benefit to Mr Carl Rosa's new and spirited undertaking. The work is carefully put on the stage and has evidently been well rehearsed, while the cast of the dramatis personæ is about as strong a one as could now be easily obtained. The Siege of Rochelle, apart from its intrinsic merits, will always possess a certain interest, as the first opera which introduced its composer to an English audience. Forty years, within a few weeks, have passed since then, in the course of which the whole of a more than ordinarily successful career was accomplished. Not until ten years later did Vincent Wallace, another Irish musician destined to attain wide popularity among us, make himself know through his Maritana—Balfe, meantime, having with sure and steady steps, advanced to the first rank of national dramatic composers. What he produced during the period that elapsed between his first opera, the Siege of Rochelle, and his last, the Talisman, which, though we are only acquainted with the Italian version at Her Majesty's Opera, was also originally intended for the English stage, is too familiar to need recounting; and, in short, we are spared the task of further preamble.

The Siege of Rochelle was first performed at Drury Lane Theatre on Thursday, October 29, 1835, when the late Mr Alfred Bunn was lessee of that establishment. The author himself, then a young man between 20 and 30, who had completed his studies in Italy and France, sat at the conductor's desk, and his compatriot, the once renowned "Tom Cooke," played the leading violin in the orchestra. The characters were thus distributed:—Clara, Miss Shirreff; Princess Euphemia, Mrs Vining; Cynthia, Mrs Newcombe; Marcella, Miss Fanny Healy; Count de Rosemberg, Mr W. Seguin; Marquis de Valmour, Mr J. Wilson; Montalban, Mr Giubelei; Corporal Schwartz, Mr Henry; Azino, the monk, Mr Paul Bedford; Michel, Mr H. Phillips. The performance, as there are many who can still remember, was highly successful, and the young musician, whose name had been previously unknown to the majority of amateurs, even in special musical circles, may be said to have won fame at a bound. It is unnecessary to enter into particulars about the opera itself which has survived long enough to be by this time exempt from criticism. The book, professedly built upon one of the novels of Madame de Genlis, though more directly adapted, we believe, from the libretto of an Italian opera derived from the same source, is neither better nor worse than subsequent ordinary concoctions of the sort, when Alfred Bunn and Edward Fitzball were the lucida sidera of the musical drama—the weakest of the traditional "three acts" being, as so often was the case, the last, wherein the denoûement is somewhat clumsily brought about, and the intrigue unwound in a not clearly intelligible manner.

The music which Balfe invented for this drama retains much of its primeval freshness, though here and there it may sound more or less antiquated. Lively and tuneful throughout, it rarely tires, while it often pleases by force of genuine spontaneity. That the greater part of it should be strongly marked with the Irish musician's own familiar individuality by no means weakens, but, on the contrary, rather enhances its charm—a composer being never more attractive than when drawing more or less exclusively upon his own resources; and this Balfe very frequently does, conglomerate as may be his general style, the result of many combined influences gathered from foreign travel and experience. The concerted music, always stirring and animated, has equally the merit of being strictly in keeping with the immediate business of the scene. That the shorter pieces, the ballads more especially, are pure Balfe, from the Balfeian spring, will be easily credited. The finales, constructed after the usual form, are varied enough in expression, and wrought out in such a manner as to insure dramatic no less than musical effect. Here the inevitable feeling induced in the mind of our composer by his exotic studies is, as in all his works, most emphatically exhibited; but for the rest he is indebted to no previous models. This brief summary will suffice for a work that obtained general acceptance so long ago, and much of which is destined in all likelihood to a further lease of popularity.

The performance of the Siege of Rochelle at the Princess's Theatre offers very few points for adverse criticism. The cast is in most parts highly efficient; and even those who remember the opera in earlier days can have found little cause for grumbling. Mdlle Ostavo Torriani is graceful and interesting in the part of Clara; while Miss Julia Gaylord, young, good-looking, and a real acquisition in the line of soubrettes, is a pleasant and lively Marcella, wife of Michel; in fact, these two characters could hardly be represented in a way more consonant with the manner of their conception. In the hands of Mr C. Lyall, Schwartz, the inebriate corporal, though a subordinate personage, becomes, as usual with that clever comedian, an original and amusing sketch. Mr Santley, as Michel, seems versed in all the traditions of the part. Nevertheless, when he made his début before a London public in 1857—at Mr John Hullah's not-to-be-forgotten concerts held in the late St Martin's Hall—two and twenty years had elapsed since the Siege of Rochelle first saw the light. Mr D. H. Bates, intrusted with the part of the Marquis de Valmour, has a voice of agreeable quality, but is as yet inexperienced. New tenors, however, are just now by no means a glut in the market—dramatic tenors in particular; and it is to be hoped that with experience Mr Bates may make sensible progress. Mrs Aynsley Cook as Euphemia, Miss Laura Hyde as Cynthia, Messrs Aynsley Cook, Ludwig, and Snazelle, as Rosemberg, Montalban, and Azino, all did their best to aid the general effect of the representation.

The musical numbers that created the liveliest impression on Friday night were those wont to excite the sympathies of audiences in former days. The overture, one of Balfe's most spirited preludes, was encored, and the allegro played again; the once famous patter-song, "Travellers all of every station," in which Michel, after the Munchausen vein, relates his adventures, was rattled through (and sung, too, be it observed) by Mr Santley, with resistless volubility, despite words almost impossible to utter musically at so rapid a pace; the at one time well-worn chorus, "Vive le Roi," though not encored, still made an undoubted impression; as did Clara's song, "Mid the earlier scenes of youth," to which Mdlle Torriani imparted earnest sentiment; while the duet for Marcella and Michel, terminating with the waltz, "Thus together side by side," sung, acted, and danced with equal spirit by Miss Julia Gaylord and Mr Santley, brought the curtain down at the conclusion of Act I. amid acclamations which would not cease until it was lifted again for a repetition of the waltz. In the next act there was again an encore for the melodious quartet, "Lo! the early beam of morning" (Clara, Marcella, Azina, and Michel) and much applause for the well-sustained finale, including the prayer, "Oh, Thou, who look'st upon the battle." In Act III., Miss Julia Gaylord delivered most effectively the ballad, "One little kiss," the last verse of which she was compelled to sing again; while Mr Santley, in "When I beheld the anchor weighed," rendered famous by Mr Henry Phillips—first example of that peculiar class of ballad to which Balfe was afterwards indebted for so large a share of his popularity, and worthy precursor of "The light of other days," "When other lips," "In this old chair," &c., was, as a matter of course, similarly and deservedly complimented. The encore was unanimous. These examples must suffice. Enough that, in the last Act, after the chorus, "Long life to our noble master," a ballet is interpolated, of which, or at all events a considerable part of which, we strongly recommend the suppression. The orchestra was excellent, from the overture to the end, the chorus was generally effective, and Mr Carl Rosa conducted the performance with as much zealous care as if he himself had been composer of the work. The success of this revival appears undoubted; and, although the Siege of Rochelle is far from being its author's best opera, it must always, as we have suggested, possess an interest apart, inasmuch as it was his first. The house was crowded in every part. More about Carl Rosa in our next.

BADEN.—The Brothers Willi and Louis Theen lately gave a concert here. Among the audience were the Empress of Germany, the Duchess of Hamilton, the Princess of Baden, and other distinguished personages.

PENNY CONCERTS.

Strictly speaking, there are no such things, and yet the term is not a misnomer, as it conveys a definite and correct idea. The admission money is not a penny, but threepence, for every one knows that 2½ groschen make threepence, and that it is in North Germany those concerts are to be heard. Delightful music, an educated people, the refining influences of melody—Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann—a kind of German "Shakspere and the musical glasses"—that is the line of idea which the word suggests to persons who have not been to visit them. And then you go to visit them, and the line of your ideas veers round like a weather-cock on a windy day. It is rather a change to start with a preconceived impression of music, and to return with a general idea of beer; to leave home in quest of refinement, and to come back saturate with tobacco. But then, what can you expect for 2½ groschen? It is an unfairness to the people to judge them from too elevated a point of view. The great truth to be collected and realised is not that the people drink oceans of beer and smoke cigars till the air of the room becomes as dense as Fleet Street in December, but that a beer-absorbing and tobacco-consuming people are capable of being pleased with Beethoven and Schubert. Miss Martineau somewhere tells a story of a Chinaman who came to London to study the manners and customs of the English, and who wrote an account of a visit he paid to Hampton Court. He was ferried across the river, and it so happened that the man who pulled the boat had a wooden leg. The Chinaman accordingly wrote home that in England all the boatmen had wooden legs, so that they might not catch cold from wet feet. In estimating these German concerts we must guard against the habit of generalisation. For instance, there is a popular impression in this country that for a few pence in Berlin or Dresden you can hear good music, which has come to mean, with us, classical music. But that is not strictly true. The music at these popular prices is, in the broader sense, popular music, the class of music that people who pay 3d. for their admission will enjoy. It is certainly superior to our music hall performances—to the "Champagne Charlie" or "Tommy Dodd" school of music. But it is one thing to avoid vulgarity, and a very different thing to attain elevation and refinement.

Let us, with no preconceived ideas, go to one of these concerts, and judge for ourselves. The hour is six o'clock, and the place one of the little suburbs outside Dresden, and—if you care for association of ideas—it is said that Schiller wrote part of Don Carlos not a hundred yards off. The people are trooping along the road, so there is no difficulty in finding the place. At the door there are two or three soldiers—for it is a military concert, or what we should call a band—and they take the entrance money. It is 50 pfennigs (about 6d. of our money), and the price includes the programme, which, by the way, acts as a pass-out check if you care to leave the building. Nothing can be more primitive than the room, which is very long, very low, and, it must be confessed, very dirty. Little marble tables in all directions, and the people clustered round them so closely that it is scarcely possible for the thoughtful-looking waiter, with a face rather of the Schiller type, too, to make his unsteady way with dozens of quarts of beer. And such an impregnation of smoke in the atmosphere! It is simply inconceivable. You see the faces all around you through a kind of hazy atmosphere, as in the reflection of a dusty mirror. Such talking, too, such jabbering, so many gutterals all crowded, such tremendous energy so long sustained. Suddenly the noise ceases, and you are conscious—through the smoke—of a platform at the far end of the room, and of an exuberant bandmaster. Even if you were deaf you would be gratified by a mere sight of this functionary. In England you will not meet a man so well pleased with everybody and so well pleased with himself. He is decorated like a Christmas tree, upholstered with the richest braids and trimmings, and, from the tremendous energy with which he waves a little flute about the size of a stethoscope, gives you the impression that he is playing on all the instruments at the same time. But we must listen to the music, if it were only for the sake of this conductor; and very familiar music it is, or ought to be. The programme tells us that it is the overture to Maritana, next follows a waltz of Strauss, then a selection from Wagner, then a polka, then the overture to Freischütz. You see it does not quite amount to being classical, and is far from the severe beauty of a Monday Popular Concert. Still, there it is for what it is worth, and it certainly is worth more than sixpence. Let us look about us and see how the people appreciate it. The room is so crowded that you cannot move. Only for the Schiller-faced waiter an avenue is made as he approaches with the beer. Of this beverage the most incalculable quantities are absorbed. There are six Germans round the table next us, and they have, in addition to their private mugs, a pair of loving cups, about the size of a pair of Wellington boots. They will be emptied in the course of that selection from Wagner, and the poetic Kellner be summoned to replenish them. All this drinking is conceivable, and it must be remarked that it does not produce the slightest intoxicating result; but the smoking is simply inconceivable. The atmosphere reeks with tobacco, is foggy and dim with the clouds of it. Does this people know what fresh air is, or realize that windows are made to open? They dread a draught much as a Frenchman dreads a cold bath, and seem to have no idea about the smoke, except to add to it. When Othello tells his traveller's tales to Desdemona, he speaks of the "Anthropophagi that each other eat." We have no cannibals in Europe, but a smoked Saxon could fall little short of a cooked animal. It is said that they attempted to have one night in the week with no smoking allowed, and it turned out a complete failure. So for six hours—at the rate of a penny an hour—the concert continues, with pauses between the parts, during which the band all go out and smoke, and the audience order more beer. Now, besides the obvious deductions from this scene, the general idea to be carried away is surely the extreme simplicity of the people. Here they sit drinking beer, enveloped in smoke, with their wives beside them knitting worsted work, listening to rather dissonant music, and thoroughly contented. Dismissing the refinement and Beethoven view as wholly untenable, there remains the question whether we would find this or anything like it at home. Could we see so large a concourse of people so orderly, so sober, and—if you wish to put it so—so passively enjoying themselves? While we must avoid the too hasty generalisation of Miss Martineau's Chinaman, we cannot shut our eyes to the truth that in this, at all events, we have something to learn from the Germans.—The Globe.

WEST BROMWICH.

Mr Hartland's concert on the 7th inst. succeeded in attracting an audience alike brilliant and numerous, stimulated at once by the pleasure of hearing artists of such note as Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr Patey, and Mr Cummings, and the desire of seeing the handsome new Town Hall (of which they are naturally not a little proud) under such favourable circumstances. To enter into anything like a detailed analysis of a programme so essentially balladish in its character would be superfluous. Enough that out of eighteen pieces no less than nine were encored, which says something for the musical appetite of the West Bromwich public, and the compliant good nature of those who ministered to their gratification. The entrepreneur contributed two pianoforte solos, in which he exhibited a neat and finished style of execution, combined with unquestionable command of the key-board, and no small knowledge of the requisite effects of light and shade. Financially speaking, the recent performance of the Messiah, under the conductorship of Mr Prince, was a success; but, not having had the advantage of being present, it would be presumptuous for me to venture an opinion on the artistic merits of those who interpreted Handel's great charity sermon. It would appear, however, that there is one considerable defect in the Town Hall—the absence of space for the accommodation of anything like an orchestra. Happily, the organ so generously offered by Mr Brogden, the Member for the borough, will settle the difficulty, as, ere it can be placed in position, it will be absolutely necessary to seriously modify existing arrangements, and provide an orchestra large enough for a band and chorus of something like two hundred, a number which seems likely soon to be reached by the choral society under the direction of Mr Hartland, whose enterprise has also found vent in the project of a series of Saturday Evening Popular Concerts, to be commenced very shortly.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

Gluck's Armida was performed at the Royal Operahouse on the birthday of Her Majesty the Empress. The cast included Mesdes von Voggenhuber, Brandt, Poppe, Horina, Herren Niemann, Betz, Ernst, Schmidt, and Nestler, who acquitted themselves more or less satisfactorily. The chorus and orchestra —the latter under the direction of Herr Eckert—were somewhat above their usual mark. But the public received the work rather coolly, a fact which some of the critics ascribe to the libretto, which they characterise as unworthy the music. The Berlin Echo observes:—

"We cannot disguise the fact that the peculiar combination of old French romanticism with the antique element is a considerable obstacle to our full enjoyment of the musical beauties of the work. Gluck's inspiration had its roots in grandiose views of the antique world, for which it found a means of expression which alone could render Antiquity intelligible to us in musical forms; and, as all attempts of the French to embody this spirit in their fashion degenerate more or less into hollow pathos, we should always be very chary of adopting the French idea of the Antique, because, by so doing, we may too easily fall into the Roccocco style. The spirit of the Middle Ages differs so essentially from the spirit of the Ancients, that any blending of the two is out of the question."

Having quoted one paper, I will proceed to quote a second. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte. Speaking of the works which were played in the course of a single week at the Royal Operahouse, and which included Rienzi, by Wagner, Czaar und Zimmermann, by Lortzing; Armide, by Gluck; Il Trovatore, by Verdi; A-ing-fo-hi, by Wüerst; and Le Prophète, by Meyerbeer, Herr Gumbert remarks, in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung:—

"The performances during the week were peculiarly well calculated to show the kaleidoscopic nature—which I consider a eulogium —of the German operatic repertory."

Having enumerated the operas I have mentioned above, the writer then continues as follows:—

"First, we have three living composers, than whom it is scarcely possible to imagine any other three differing more in their respective powers and tendencies. But the Wagner of Rienzi is not yet the Wagner of Die Meistersinger. In those days, Wagner strove, to the best of his ability, to imitate the fashion of the French grand opera; Rienzi keeps its place permanently on the boards, and has proved a decided success, even in Paris. The creator himself at present disowns it; nevertheless, I have never heard—and I do not blame him—that he has ever rejected the sums, which certainly cannot be inconsiderable, which Rienzi still brings him in. In saying this, I would merely direct attention to the fact that, in money matters, not only is there an end of good nature, but frequently of artistic principle as well. By the side of the three living, we have three deceased composers, the talent of the three latter, like that of the three former, pursuing three perfectly different directions: the classic and monumental Gluck; the brilliant Meyerbeer, so certain in the impression he produced upon the public of every nation; and the modest modernised Dittersdorf; Albert Lortzing. I consider that, compared with the monotonous repertory of lyric theatres abroad, it redounds to the credit of our own lyric theatres that they give as many works as possible which have made their way with the public, and not been washed away by time."

Miss Minnie Hauck entered upon her duties as a permanent member of the company at the Royal Operahouse, by appearing as Marguerite in M. Gounod's Faust.

The parts in Herr Ignaz Brüll's opera, Das Goldene Kreuz, have been given out. Herr Eduard Kretschmer's work, Die Folkunger, on the contrary, though definitively accepted, will not be produced this year. Nothing more has been heard lately as to the date when Herr Wagner's Tristan und Isolde will be brought out.

A melancholy occurrence took place a few evenings since, just previous to the commencement of Le Prophète. A member of the orchestra, Herr Besser, a bassoonist, feeling unwell, left his place and went to sit down in a small room under the stage. Here he was discovered shortly afterwards dead. The surgeon of the theatre on being called in stated the cause of death to have been apoplexy. The report of what had happened spread like lightning through the orchestra. The second bassoonist, who had occupied the seat next to the Deceased, fainted at the shock occasioned by the sad intelligence. It was some time before substitutes for the two instrumentalists could be found, and the opera was delayed in consequence. Herr Schulz (tenor), the son-in-law of the Deceased, left his post as a matter of course. Two days previously, another member of the orchestra, Herr Richter, an oboist, had likewise had an apoplectic attack.

A very numerous audience assembled in the Concerthaus for the first concert given by Herr Bilse and his orchestra on their return from St Petersburgh.

The Emperor has sent 500 marks to the committee for erecting at Schmalkalden a monument to the memory of Karl Wilhelm, composer of "Die Wacht am Rhein." His Majesty, in the autograph letter accompanying his contribution, terms the project "a work of patriotic gratitude."

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

That Messrs Harrisons' first concert of the season, with Mdme Adelina Patti as the bright particular star, should prove a brilliant success was a foregone conclusion, and the admired prima donna being in fine voice, the enthusiasm was proportionate and the encores to match. Signors Urio and Campobello were the other vocalists, Mdlle Castellan and Mr Kuhe contributing the instrumental part, with violin and pianoforte respectively.

The Birmingham Amateur Harmonic differs somewhat in its scope and aim from other Musical Societies of the district, its object being the production of works altogether new, or such as, by the rarity of their performance, carry with them the air of quasi novelty; leaving familiar compositions to other associations. Thus, for instance, while the Festival Choral Society begins its season with Rossini's Stabat Mater, Mendelssohn's Lauda Zion, and Spohr's "God, Thou art great," the Amateur Harmonic produces Henry Smart's Jacob, and Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia," as pièces de resistance! That the first named, of so recent origin as the Glasgow Festival of 1874, should not have been already heard in Birmingham, may be readily understood; but that Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" should never before have been performed in this (professedly) musical town is not quite so easy of comprehension. So much was written of Jacob at the time of its production, that to go into anything like detail on the subject now would be but mere recapitulation. Suffice it, that the reputation made by the composer with his Bride of Dunkerron at the Birmingham Festival of 1864 (the same year as Costa's Naaman and Arthur Sullivan's Kenilworth were produced) will be considerably enhanced by his sacred cantata, which, if at times suggestive of Mendelssohn, is none the less acceptable on that account. Charming as is the vocal writing, the instrumentation is no less deserving praise, the hand of the practised musician being everywhere perceptible, and the whole effect, as a natural consequence, in the highest degree satisfactory. The principal singers were Miss Emma Beasley (a rising local soprano); Madame Poole, whose ripe experience lent material aid to the contralto part; the tenor and bass solos being entrusted to Mr W. Shakespeare and Mr Ainsworth respectively, both gentlemen doing their best with physical means not altogether adequate to the requirements of so large a room as the Town Hall. The florid soprano air for Rachel, "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness," and the unaccompanied chorus, "Behold how good and pleasant it is," were both repeated in obedience to the unanimous desire of the audience, whose applause was both frequent and discriminative. In the Choral Fantasia, Mr Walter Bache sustained the pianoforte part with an executive skill which met with due recognition at the hands of his fellow-townsmen. Both the cantata and the fantasia might have been improved by more practice in the shape of rehearsals. True, the conductor, Mr Sutton, worked his hardest to keep them together, and inflicted much (too audible) chastisement on his score; but without effect either in reducing the frequent straggling and irregularity of his forces, or in subduing the loudness of the instruments, which, at times, rendered the soloists all but inaudible. For next week a ballad concert, with Mr Sims Reeves as the principal attraction, is announced.

ARTICLE I.—NAME.

This Association shall be known and distinguished by the title of "THE MUSICAL MUTUAL PROTECTIVE UNION."

ARTICLE II.—OBJECT.

The object of this Union is to unite the instrumental portion of the musical profession for the better protection of its interests in general.

ARTICLE III.—OFFICERS.

SECT. 1. The Officers of this Union shall consist of a President, a Vice-President, a Treasurer, a Secretary, three Trustees, and an executive Committee of seven, all of which said officers together shall constitute a Board of Directors; and of such subordinate officers, agents, and assistants, as the Union by its by-laws, rules and regulations shall direct. Which officers shall be elected annually to their respective offices, by such of the members of the Union as are entitled by its rules to vote at such election, except delegates to the Musicians' National Protective Association of the United States, which shall be appointed at the quarterly Meeting in March, and shall assume their office at the proper time.

SECT. 2. The election of said officers shall be held annually in the city of New York, on the second Thursday in September. A committee shall be appointed at the quarterly meeting, in June of each year, to nominate candidates for the officers to be elected.

SECT. 3. Candidates for office may be voted for by ballot or otherwise, and receive a plurality of the votes cast to entitle them to an election.

SECT. 4. All officers so elected shall assume their duties on the second Thursday of December next ensuing their election, and shall continue for the term of one year thereafter, unless otherwise provided for.

ARTICLE IV.—MEMBERSHIP.

All efficient and capable professional Instrumental Performers shall be eligible for membership, subject to the By-laws.

ARTICLE V.—FUNDS.

The Funds of the Union shall be raised by admission fees, quarterly dues, fines, concerts, &c.

BY-LAWS.

ARTICLE I.—DUTIES OF OFFICERS.

SECT. 1. It shall be the duty of the President to preside at the meetings of the Union and Board of Directors, and enforce a due observance of the Constitution and its By-laws; sign all bills; convene Special Meetings of the Union and Board of Directors, and give the casting vote in case of a tie; and he shall be ex-officio member of all Committees.

SECT. 2. It shall be the duty of the Vice-President, in the absence of the President, to perform the duties of the President.

SECT. 3. It shall be the duty of the Secretary to keep a faithful record of the proceedings at the meetings of the Union and Board of Directors; answer all communications to the Union; keep a true account with the Union and all the members; fill up all certificates of membership; issue notices for all meetings of the Union or Board of Directors; countersign all bills; report quarterly, and prepare, previously to every annual meeting, a minute statement of the funds and effects belonging to the Union, and all other important matters, with other useful information, specifying in whose custody or possession all the funds and effects shall then be, together with an account of the sums received and expended on behalf of the Union since the last previous financial statement; issue semi-annually a printed directory of all the members' names of this Union, with their addresses and instruments they perform on; and perform all other duties appertaining to his office, not herein enumerated. He shall receive a salary of $400, or more, per annum—payable quarterly. He shall, on the expiration of his term of office, transfer all books, papers, documents, or other property belonging to the Union, into the hands of his successor in office. And he shall act ex-officially on all committees when so called upon.

SECT. 4. It shall be the duty of the Treasurer to collect all the dues, admission fees and fines; to pay all bills passed by the Board of Directors for payment and countersigned by the President and Secretary; to keep an accurate account of all monies received and expended, in a set of books belonging to the Union, and to render every quarter a detailed statement of all receipts and expenditures, with the balance on hand. And it shall be his duty to deposit all sums of money, exceeding one hundred dollars, in the hands of the Chairman of the Trustees. He shall give the required bonds for the faithful discharge of his duties on assuming his office. He shall at the expiration of his term of office deliver into the hands of his successor all moneys, books and property belonging to the Union.

SECT. 5. The Trustees shall hold the funds in charge and invest them, with the advice and concurrence of the Board of Directors, safely, and deposit them in one or more Savings Banks; collect the interests on funds invested upon bond and mortgage and other funds in Bank; see to the renewal of insurance polices, and attend to the business appertaining to their office; they shall make quarterly reports, and an annual one to the Union. The Chairman of this Board shall give sufficient bonds for the faithful discharge of his duties, as he will hold funds in his hands before they can be deposited or invested. All amounts of money due on sales of property or real estate, in case of foreclosure (so ordered by the Union or Board of Directors), or the amounts of invested funds receivable from mortgages, shall be in either case paid or deposited by the requisite parties to the credit of the Musical Mutual Protective Union, in such Bank or Banks as may be ordered by the Board of Directors; and all moneys so paid or deposited can only be drawn by the check of the Chairman of the Trustees, indorsed by the two other Trustees, and countersigned by the President and Secretary, and the Seal of the Union affixed to it, payable to the order of the parties who are to receive said funds on new investments. They shall hold four regular quarterly meetings, and meet oftener if the business requires it.

* Founded April 23, 1863; organized and adopted June 26, 1864; amended and revised September 13, 1867, March 25th, 1869, and March 14, 1872.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

On Monday last the great room of the Free Trade Hall was crowded to excess, the attraction being Mr Sims Reeves, who was in splendid voice, and whose perfect singing once more charmed his enthusiastic Manchester admirers. He never gave "Adelaida" with greater finish, with more exquisite feeling; and how he sang Sullivan's "Once Again" and the old ballad, "Tom Bowling," your readers do not require to be told. Signor Foli, who was of the party, is a great favourite here, and he, too, was very cordially received. His fine voice is in perfect condition, and he could be ill spared at the present time. Mdme Cave Ashton, Miss Dalton, Mdlle Bertha Brousil, and Mr H. Nicholson, also took part in the concert, which was ably conducted by Mr Sydney Naylor.

Since my last letter Mr Alfred Cellier's Tower of London has been produced at the Prince's Theatre, and so great has been its popular success, that the theatre has been nightly crowded ever since. The music is clever and pretty, and the composer, without forgetting the conditions of art, has written his songs, duets, and choruses in a manner to attract the multitude. In nearly every respect the Tower of London is an advance on Mr Cellier's previous work, The Sultan of Mocha, though that, of its class, is an admirable opera. The Tower of London is mounted with remarkable splendour, the scenery is as fine as could be desired, the dresses, by Mr Alfred Thompson, surpass any of his previous designs, and the processions and other spectacular effects would have been sufficient in themselves to make a less delightful work acceptable. The principal parts are cleverly sustained by Mdme Pauline Rita, Miss Alice Cook, Messrs George Fox, Furneaux Cook, and J. G. Taylor.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Herr Bernhard Scholz's romantic opera, Golo, has been produced very successfully at the Stadttheater.

IN another page will be found a photograph fac simile letter from the celebrated composer, Gioacchino Rossini.

"IT is the last straw," we are informed, "which breaks the camel's back." Assuming for the nonce the patient beast of burden to be typical of John Bull, we fancy we must have very nearly approached the last straw in the matter of the granting of dancing and music licences, and that John, not wishing to suffer the grievous bodily injury set forth in the apophthegm, will ride rusty while there are still a few straws left, and before the last one is reached. Who can blame him if he does? To drop metaphor, people are not exactly satisfied with the existing licensing system; in fact, they are quite the reverse; they are heartily sick of it. A few more such cases as we have had lately will effectually rouse them into declaring their opinion, and, when the British public is once in earnest, the Plimsoll episode and the Fugitive Slave Circular should teach the Powers that be what is the immediate and inevitable result.

The Curfew was, in its time, regarded as a highly estimable institution by many worthy persons—of the Norman persuasion—and worked well in the interests of those by whom it was invented. Still there can be no doubt that anyone advocating its revival now-a-days would meet with considerable opposition from the community in general—not to speak of the gas companies and dealers in parafin. Similarly, at some former epoch, the licensing system, as applied to music and dancing, may have been a well-considered and sensible measure. At the present day, it is simply a nuisance, an absurdity, and an anachronism. But we will not discuss the principle involved, for to do so would be merely a loss of time and space, seeing that all sensible persons have long since been agreed upon that head. We will content ourselves with giving an instance of how the precious system works.

"Show me your cigars and I will tell you what tobacco you smoke," observed an English sage. Let us know the men connected with any undertaking, and we shall be tolerably capable of informing you what sort of an affair the undertaking is. Now J. R. Millais, R.A., is not a bad name; nor more is Tom Taylor, nor Lord Skelmersdale, nor Baron Alfred Rothschild; men do not look with suspicion on J. R. Planché, or Lord de Lisle and Dudley, or George Cruikshank, or C. D. Leslie, R.A.; and we have yet to learn that Calumny has ever breathed a word against Lord Newry, W. Calder Marshall, R.A., or the Earl of Dunraven. All these gentlemen, with a host of others of equal standing and respectability, are connected with the Royal Westminster Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society; yet that Society, as personified by its representatives, passed a mauvais quart d'heure on the 8th inst. before the bench of Middlesex Magistrates, presided over by Captain Morley, at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell.

The Society applied for a music and dancing licence, the application being supported by Mr Poland, Mr Besley, Mr Douglas Straight, and Mr Montague Williams, and opposed by Mr Ribton, in behalf of Westminster Hospital; Mr Serjeant Sleigh, in behalf of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster; and—in behalf of Westminster School—Mr J. P. Grain, or Gray, for the gentleman's patronymic appears to be so faintly inscribed upon the roll of Fame that some papers read it, Grain, and others, Gray. After stating the plan and future arrangements—with which our readers are already acquainted—of the Aquarium directors, Mr Poland, alluding to the application for a dancing licence, observed that it was intended in one part of the building to have amusements for children at Christmas time, and that these amusements might necessitate some dancing. At other times the Fellows might have a private ball. If, asked the learned council, these things can be done without detriment to the public interests, why not do them?

In answering this simple and straight-forward question, the learned gentlemen on the other side did not appear to particular advantage. We believe that counsel are no more at liberty to refuse a brief than a member of the College of Physicians is permitted to take a lancet from his pocket, and bleed a man in a fit, though the man's life depends on his doing so. Such is, respectively, the etiquette of the two professions. Perhaps it was under pressure of this etiquette alone that Mr Ribton, Mr Serjeant Sleigh, and Mr J. P. Grain—or Gray—put on their wigs and gowns last Friday, the 8th inst. Let us hope so. On that supposition only can we excuse the nonsense they talked. Mr Serjeant Sleigh urged that if a licence for dancing were granted, "it might be abused in case of a change from the present management." If it were, could it not be revoked at the next meeting of Middlesex Magistrates? So, only "in case of a change from the present management." But, a moment afterwards, the learned Serjeant proceeded to stultify himself and insult the "present management" by affirming "that the dancing licence was applied for with some object which was not to be seen on the surface." Rather inconsistent for a Serjeant-at-Law.

Mr Ribton, reading Mr Poland's inmost thoughts, asserted that, not content with boasting that England was becoming at last a musical nation, Mr Poland wished it also to be a dancing nation. What! because Mr Poland merely asked for a dancing licence for the Westminster Aquarium? Surely this is generalizing with a vengeance. "Was it desirable," continued Mr Ribton, "that we should become a nation of dancers?" The question was followed by loud laughter. At what or at whom was the public laughing? At Mr Ribton? "Would they," he inquired, with an utter disregard of reason, "have people neglect their business for the sake of dancing?"

"'Tripping merrily as they go
On the light fantastic toe?'"

But the acme of forensic profundity was contained in the remark that: "When that happened, the business-like habits of John Bull would forsake him." What a remarkable discovery! How startling! How new! How unsuspected! When a person neglects his business, his business habits forsake him. Really, the proper authorities ought at once to insure the Thames in three or four of the wealthiest fire-offices. There is no knowing what Mr Ribton may be about.

But while we may forgive weak argument and feeble jocularity, we cannot be so lenient towards vapid personality. This remark is intended for Mr J. P. Grain—or Gray. What right had that not too celebrated advocate to state that "they" (the directors or the public?) "wanted that man Strauss, with his hair tumbling about?" What right had he to talk about "a twopenny-halfpenny waltz of Blumenthal and Strauss?" The purity of the Westminster Boys may be preserved from contamination, and the ends of justice attained, without gratuitous and meaningless ridicule of two worthy and accomplished gentlemen and musicians. Then Mr J. P. Grain's—or Gray's—excruciating humour to the effect that the Westminster Boys, instead of going to the Aquarium to examine the fish, might visit the place to inspect the mermaids! We feel that "witty" is not the proper term for such mental coruscations. We do not know whether Mr J. P. Grain—or Gray—has a daughter; but, if he does possess such a treasure, some friend, referring to her father, as Hamlet once spoke to Ophelia of hers, should forthwith bid her: "Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool nowhere but in 's own house."

The upshot was that, though the Bench granted the music licence, virtue was upheld, public morality preserved, and, in a word, England saved from destruction, by the refusal of the licence for dancing. Really, all this would be ludicrous were it not pitiable. It is, however, consolatory to reflect that the obnoxious and antiquated system cannot last much longer. Still it may endure for a few years. In view of such a contingency, let us trust that, until the happy period of its final abolition, we may not witness many more such proceedings as those at the Clerkenwell Sessions House on Friday, the 8th inst. We do not ask from Counsel of a certain type politeness or close reasoning—it is foolish to demand from any individuals aught it is beyond their power to grant—but we certainly must request them to favour us in future with a small modicum of respect for the decencies of society and the rules of common sense. HAYDN AND BEETHOVEN.

SELDOM has more variety been compressed within such narrow limits. The symphonies of Haydn and Beethoven have absolutely nothing in common but a certain cheerfulness of character, which with Haydn's music is a rule, and with Beethoven's an exception. Perhaps in no long work by the epic poet of the orchestra are there so many traits of humour—outbursts, in short, of animal spirits, surprises not less playful and charming than they are wholly unanticipated—as in the Symphony No. ——. But how different the mirth of Beethoven from that of Haydn! The "Father of the Symphony," as he is styled, and justly, has never an arrière-pensée. When he laughs, he laughs right merrily. When he weeps, it is an April shower; the placid smile soon peeps out again, and the brief sorrow is dispersed, like the mist by the sun. Beethoven laughs even more unreservedly than Haydn, but there are tears in his laughter which come from an opposite source; while his sorrow lies far deeper, and at periods is as absorbing as that of the other is evanescent. Compare, for instance, the slow movements of the two symphonies under notice. Each contrasts forcibly with what has gone before and what is to come after; but, while Haydn appears simply as if in a passing reverie, the soul of Beethoven is plunged in sadness. It is pleasant to contemplate an art capable of giving eloquent utterance to such widely different sentiments; and surely no two men were ever more clearly reflected in their music than Mozart's great predecessor, no less than contemporary, and the one who survived, and in a certain sense surpassed, both that predecessor and contemporary, but even Mozart himself.

We regret to hear that news has come by telegram of a severe accident to M. Gounod. The eminent composer, on leaving the house of a friend, slipped and fell so heavily that he became unconscious. It was found that his right arm was broken; and he now lies at the house where the accident happened, Mdme Gounod being in attendance upon him.

Another telegram states that the friend referred to was Mr Oscar Commettant, to whose house M. Gounod had been in order to take away certain MSS. that had recently come from England. It was first thought he was killed, but after medical examination it was found that he had merely fractured the right shoulder, which will probably disable him from using his arm for two months to come.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

We read in Dwight's Journal of Music that Dr von Bülow intends to give seven concerts at Boston, some of them with orchestra. The Doctor will play on Chickering's pianos. "The other bright particular star of the pianoforte heavens, Mdme Arabella Goddard"—we learn from the same authority—"has joined the Tietjens constellation, which will be very lustrous. We are informed that Mr Max Strakosch has engaged her to appear with Mdlle Tietjens, in sixty concerts, for which he is to pay the great pianist three thousand pounds sterling, the engagement to commence in New York, on the 4th October, and conclude about the middle of January. We presume this 'Double Star' will shine on Boston when the Bülow sets."

During the recent meeting of the Emperor of Germany, the Archduke Albert of Austria, and Prince Charles, at Fürtenstein, a monster performance was given in the courtyard of the Castle—splendidly illuminated for the occasion—by eight bands belonging to the infantry, five to the cavalry, two to the artillery, one to the rifles, and one to the pioneers, making in all seventeen bands and two hundred drums, or about a thousand performers.

The "Nibelungenring."—It is not easy to condense within reasonable space a mere outline of the plan adopted by Wagner in the construction of his most recent, exhaustive, and exhausting, work. To describe it part by part, scene by scene, is out of the question in the columns of a newspaper; nor, were this practicable, would the majority of readers be likely to take much interest in the description. The Fliegende Holländer, Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, being treated as abstract mediæval myths, are intelligible enough; though the poet-composer has done his utmost, in successive stages, to depart from the comparatively earnest simplicity which distinguishes the first (and, as some incline to think, best) of these from the second, and still more emphatically from the third. Passing by Tristan, that earnest legitimate exemplification of the absolute Wagnerian theory; passing also by the Meistersinger, a soi-disant "comic" episode, which for an instant diverted the master's thoughts from carrying out the gigantic scheme, whose completion was looked forward to as the "crowning the edifice" symbolically representing his long-pondered system of

THE Abbate Franz Liszt has been created an "Illustrious Member of the St Cecilia Society, Rome." The "Illustrious Member" has returned thanks in the following letter, written in French:—

"MONSIEUR LE PRESIDENT,—The Royal Academy of St Cecilia has kindly bestowed on me a title of honour, of which I fully appreciate the distinction. Truly grateful for this high mark of good feeling, I consider myself fortunate in returning it, to a certain extent, by my zealous devotion to musical art, and the most lively admiration for the great geniuses who have rendered that art illustrious in Italy from the days of Palestrina to our own.

"Their works remain to fertilise the Future.

"I beg you to receive, Sir, the assurance of my respectful thanks, and of the sentiments of profound esteem with which I have the honour to remain, your very obedient servant, "F. LISZT.

"Rome, 22nd September, 1875."

ON a principle somewhat analogous to that by which children under twelve are carried at a cheaper rate than adults, in omnibuses, steamboats, and railway carriages, artists of subordinate rank at the Grand Opera, Paris, are not charged by the Chief of the Claque so much as those of higher rank. The great "stars" have to pay very heavily indeed. But when an artist has come to terms with the Chief of the Claque, the manager enjoys the right of forbidding the applause at the specified moments, and the artist is consequently so much out of pocket, for one maxim with the worthy Chief is: "Pay to-day, trust to-morrow," all transactions being only for cash down, on the nail, while another is: "No money returned." This arrangement sometimes gives rise to unpleasant bickerings. Thus, not very long ago, a well-known artist, who shall be nameless, paid for an enthusiastic volley of "bravos" followed by an encore after the final trio in the first act of a certain opera which, also, shall be nameless. But M. Halanzier objected. This occasioned a lively passage of arms between him and the Artist. At last, a compromise was effected. The Claque duly shouted "bravo" but refrained from an encore.

FORMING part, as it does, of a gentleman's mansion, or pallazzo signorile, the room in which Donizetti died, at Bergamo, has been left just as it was in April 1848, when the illustrious composer expired in the arms of his intimate friend Dolci, and in presence of the Monk, Francesco, of the Archpriest of the Cathedral, and of his faithful servant, Pourcelet. It is covered with a grey flowered paper; the ceiling is plastered, and the hangings are white and sky-blue. On the walls are suspended a few engravings by Raimpoldi, and a large watch. The bedstead, which is extremely small, is placed with its right side to the wall and opposite the windows. It stands in a modest alcove, and the bedclothes are of the plainest kind. The polished furniture, the candlesticks, and the wooden armchairs belong to an epoch which, though not very distant, at once strikes one as not our own. Other objects in the old room merit respectful attention. There are many autographs of Donizetti; a brindisi written by Mayr in sestines; the ring Donizetti had on his finger when he died; a small medal he always wore round his neck, and which was a memorial of his mother; a lock of his hair; and a blue silk bag, old and tattered, containing sacred effigies which he always carried in his waist-coat pocket. Another object there is the easy chair in which he sat during his last days, when, sickly and with failing strength, he struggled against a most acute disease. It is covered with yellow and sky-blue stuff, and has, in front of it, a sort of small shelf of bright walnut-wood, made so that he might write while in a reclining position, and a projection at the top part of the back for him to rest his head against. All these relics are in the Palazzo Moriui, in a street which, for somewhat more than a month, has changed its former name of St Cassiano for that of Gaetano Donizetti.

ACORNS, SLOES, AND BLACKBERRIES.

By Gibbs Gibb Gibbs, Esq.

No. 16.

Samuel Mather, organist of St James's Church, Sheffield (elected in 1799). In the year 1806 Mather, in conjunction with his brother, John Mather, and J. Foster, of High Green, began the Yorkshire amateur concerts at Sheffield. In the following year they were held at Leeds, and the next at York, and have been continued since that time, with increasing pleasure to the lovers of music. In the year 1814 he established the Yorkshire choral concert, of which he was sole manager for the first four years, having obtained the names of the noblemen and gentlemen of the county to support it, by an annual subscription of one guinea each, and having an excellent band of vocal and instrumental performers. Here he brought forward every month a performance which was always numerously attended. The Messiah, Judas, Samson, Israel in Egypt, The Creation, Athalia, Jephtha, Acis and Galatea, Alexander's Feast, with various selections from the best composers, followed in succession. The same plan was afterwards adopted by his brother in Edinburgh.

John Milton, the father of our justly celebrated epic poet, was a native of Milton, near Halton and Thame, in Oxfordshire, He was educated for the law, and practised as a scrivener in Bread Street, London; but he acquired considerable celebrity as a musical composer. Among the Psalm tunes published by Ravenscroft, in 1633, there are many with the name of John Milton to them. One of these, called the York Tune, is well known in almost every parish church in the kingdom. It is said, in Phillips's life of his son, that Milton composed a fugue "In nomine," of no fewer than forty parts, for which he was rewarded by a Polish Prince, to whom he presented it, with a gold medal and chain.

Mimnermus.—About the beginning of the sixth century before the Christian era, Mimnermus, according to Plutarch, had rendered himself remarkable by playing upon the flute a nome called "Cradias," which, Hesychius tells us, was an air for that instrument, usually performed at Athens during the march or procession of the victims of expiation. Mimnermus was of Smyrna, contemporary with Solon. Athenæus gives to him the invention of the pentameter verse. His elegies were so much admired in antiquity that Horace preferred them to those of Callimachus.

Jerome Joseph de Momigny, of Belgian origin, was born at Phillippeville in 1776. Momigny, independently of his musical abilities, was a very learned man, and has particularly distinguished himself by the publication of a work in three volumes 8vo, entitled "Cours complet d'Harmonie et de Composition d'après une Théorie nouvelle et générale de la Musique basés sur des Principes incontestables, puisés dans la Nature," &c. This book may be considered as containing a new theory of music, founded partly on the system of Balliere, which was expanded by Jamard, and partly on views of the Abbé Feyton, which appear in the "Article chromatique," in the "Encyclopédie Méthodique." According to the theory of Momigny, the generator produces the following interval, G, b, d, g, b, d, f, a, c, e, which he calls l'unique type of the musical system, and compares the seven musical notes, a, b, c, d, e, f, g, proceeding from the generating string, to the phenomena of the decomposition of light, discovered by Newton by means of a prism. Momigny ably completed the musical part of "Encyclopédie Méthodique," left unfinished by the revolution, which sacrificed some of the most able original authors.

CHRISTINE NILSSON IN DUBLIN.

(From Saunders' News-Letter, Oct. 12.)

This distinguished artist again appeared before the Dublin public, after the lapse of a few years since her first visit; and, although the impression she then left has not been effaced from the memories of those who then heard her, she now comes with more power of voice, more intelligence of conception, and more dramatic intensity of expression. Judging of her in the concert room, we should immediately predict that she would rank amongst the highest who have taken honours on the lyric stage—as she has done; and yet there is a charm in her concert singing very difficult to describe. It is sometimes semi-dramatic, giving a thrilling interest to what she delivers, rarely attained by any of her compeers, which produces that indefinable effect alluded to above—an effect which appeals solely to the feelings, and awakens the sympathies of the heart. This the tearful tones of her voice accomplishes alone, it is so entirely sympathetic in movements of expression; but then, anon, it will rise to a glow of enthusiastic power, should the poetry and music demand it. That Mdme Nilsson is an artist of the highest culture will be confessed by all; but she is more. There is an amount of intelligence in interpreting what she seeks to make her audience comprehend, which springs from herself, and can only be the result of genius. Now, her singing of "The jewel song," from Faust, last evening, was so clear in delivery, so rich in brilliancy, and yet rendered with such apparent ease, as almost to appear like the lark's song—an instinctive inspiration. She was rapturously encored, and immediately replied by a recital of "The minstrel boy," which she gave with a richness of tone and truthfulness of phrasing never realised in our memory by any other singer of an Irish melody.

She also joined Mr Lloyd in Verdi's duo, "Parigi o cara," which she sang with touching tenderness. Here the sympathetic tones of her voice, which we have mentioned before, must have been felt by all present. Sullivan's ballad "Let me dream again," she gave with so much felicity, that all we can say is, happy the composer who has such an exponent of his compositions! This drew down another encore, which she answered by singing "Let Erin remember the days of old," with surpassing energy and warmth of utterance. In the "Swedish Melodies" she again raised the audience to enthusiasm, and she found it impossible to resist the encore, and was obliged to repeat the second of the two melodies, "Le Bal." These she sings with a fervour which amazes, and they are so catching in their eccentricity of expression and brilliancy as almost to bewilder. The remainder of the programme was admirably given by the other members of the company. Mr Lloyd was encored in the "Rose Song," from Il Talismano, and likewise in Sullivan's "Sweethearts," to which he replied by giving Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud." Miss Fairman, Mdlle Levier, and Signor Caravoglia, ably assisted in the concerted pieces, and the artistic entrepreneur of the concerts, gained deserved encores for his admirable pianoforte playing. The next concert takes place on Wednesday forenoon.

ORATORIO OF THE DELUGE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—I have just seen a paragraph to the effect that Mr F. H. Cowen is about to produce an oratorio under the above title. Now, it is extremely probable that another day I might be accused of borrowing the idea from him, which I should much regret. Will you, therefore, be so good as to allow me to state that it is nearly four years ago that I compiled the libretto of an oratorio under the very same title of The Deluge, and that the composers who pronounced it to be admirably adapted for music, and expressed regret that they could not make use of it, were Sir F. G. Ouseley, Sir Julius Benedict, and Mr Arthur Sullivan. The insertion of these few lines may save me another day from the charge of purposely taking the same subject as Mr Cowen, whereas it will be seen that I was first in the field.—Yours faithfully, Winchester, October 13th, 1875. T. Lloyd Fowle.

Shanghai.—Three Italian artists, Signor and Signora Palmieri, and Signorina Alice Persiani, gave some very well attended concerts at the Lyceum Theatre, last August.

WORCESTER CATHEDRAL.

By way of completing the important work of the restoration of Worcester Cathedral, or rather as supplementary to it, two additional features have just been added, and were open to public inspection yesterday. These are the erection of new altar rails, the gift of the Countess of Dudley, and the filling in of the great west window of the cathedral with stained glass, the gift of the Earl of Dudley. Both are from designs by Sir Gilbert Scott, R.A. The altar rails are of brass, of most elaborate workmanship, surmounted with cushioning of red velvet. The window is by Messrs Hardman, of Birmingham. The subject of the glass is the "Creation," as narrated in Genesis i. and ii. The six days' work is represented in the outer triplets of lights (three on each side), and the sequel of the "Creation"—the story of Adam and Eve and their fall—is continued in the two central lights. Above all, on the great wheel of the tracery, is represented the seventh day—that of rest. The window has eight lancet lights divided by light stone shafts and surmounted by a great wheel and tracery. The design of the stonework is in style a mixture of early English and early decorated, the forms of the tracery being of the latter, whilst the mouldings and carvings are of the former. So in the treatment of the glass some features in the design are later in style than the ornamentation, which is strictly in accord with the early English carving throughout the cathedral. The glass is of the thick, antique quality, not "antiquated" in the painting, but left, as ancient windows were, to acquire by time and weather the perfect mellowness of tone that age alone can give.

The design of the "Creation" reads from the top of the dexter triplet of lights in the window where is shown the work of the "First Day"—the creation of light, the figure of the Saviour, the Second Person in the Holy Trinity (as is usual in early Christian art), being represented holding in His hand the newly made light which emanates in rays. The division of light and darkness is also shown; and in a golden belt is the text "And God saw the light that it was good," &c. Similar texts throughout the chapter relating the works of the successive six days are given on the other portions of the window, and each is illustrated in a similar manner to the above. Among the prominent figures are represented (in the life of Adam and Eve) the temptation and fall, and the expulsion from the Garden of Eden. The seasons are represented—"Spring," as a young maiden with garlands; "Summer," as a reaper with sheaf; "Autumn," as a man bearing a bushel of ripe fruit; and "Winter," as an old man with staff cowering over a fire. The seventh day—the "Day of Rest"—is represented on the wheel of tracery at the top of the window. In the centre is a half figure of the Saviour in glory; one hand holds the universe, and the other is uplifted in the act of blessing. Immediately around are seraphim, and beyond is the angelic host, adoring, singing, and playing musical instruments (Eh! Canon Barry!); over all are censer-bearing angels.

MADRID.—Signora Alice Spaak has been added to the Italian Opera Company. The season was to be inaugurated with Sig. Verdi's Aida.

VIENNA.—The ballet of Brahma, by M. Monplaisir, is in rehearsal at the Imperial Operahouse, under the personal direction of its author. M. Montplaisir is, perhaps, the most popular and fertile ballet-master at present in Italy, the land of ballets, and Brahma is his most successful creation, having been performed in Milan, Naples, Rome, Florence, Turin, and other large towns of the Ausonian Peninsula.—The receipts at the Imperial Operahouse for the month of September last were 9,078 florins more than they were for the corresponding month last year, despite the fact that this year the theatre was closed one evening for a rehearsal of Brahma, and that the receipts of that evening were consequently lost.

PESTH.—A series of six grand orchestral concerts is to be given here in the course of the winter, under the direction of Herren Goldmark, Brahms, and Herbeck, of Vienna; Herr Reinecke, of Leipsic; Herr Lachner, of Munich; and Dr Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, each of whom will conduct in person those works of his which may be comprised in the programmes. Among the artists engaged are Mad. Friedrich-Materna, Mad. Wilt, and Herr Wilhelmj.—It is reported that Franz Liszt, at present stopping in Rome, has written to inform the secretary of the Academy of Music that he will arrive here in time for the opening of that institution on the 3rd or 4th November.

"'TIS THE LAST ROSE OF SUMMER."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—For the last time I address you on the history of this melody. When I upset Mr Brinley Richards' statement, given at his lecture on National Music, and proved its modern origin conclusively, he is informed where he can get information from a standard authority worthy of credit, respecting the ancient music of Ireland; instead of that, he will not accept a writer of renown on both Irish and Welsh music, but accepts the hear-say talk of parties who know nothing about it, merely because he asserts that there is no affinity between certain words of Irish and Welsh, and that some ancient instrument, called a cryth, is played by a bow, and worthy of a place in the modern history of music, and, for stating so, he will not put his faith in him. I might as well state that the cong-shell of the South-Sea Islanders, with fish-gut strings, is worthy of a place in the Philharmonic orchestra. Now, Walker is truthful, and has well investigated the old music of Ireland and Wales; he does not state that airs of a comparatively modern date are old songs of the peasantry, nor that English modern songs are Welsh and Irish melodies, nor does he give florid transcriptions of Hungarian and other melodies, by Liszt and others, as specimens of national music. This, as I before stated, should not be in a lecture of national music of all nations. Mr B. Richards, in his lecture, should state, for the future, that three-fourths of the lecture will comprise anecdotes of the Welsh melodies; and when he attempts the Irish portion, pray let him consult an Irish authority, if he will not put faith in Walker—why, old Bunting's three volumes of Ancient Irish Melodies, with the late Mr Petrie's work on Irish Music—he will in those works find trustworthy matter for his next lecture on national music, though three-fourths of it may consist of Welsh music and history, second hand though it is in the eyes of every unprejudiced thinker on the matter. I now conclude as to the "Last Rose of Summer."—I am, yours obediently,

YOUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Barnum wants a new hippodrome. The old gentleman is becoming economical, and intends constructing a very much smaller one than the Fourth Avenue building, in New York.

Mr Maybrick, the accomplished barytone, has resumed his profession, and will be heard again at the Ballad concerts, and various others, we trust, during the ensuing season.

Lohengrin has been produced at the Dublin Theatre, with Mdlle Albani as Elsa. The local papers are full of the event; but we must postpone further particulars till our next.

The reason Adelina Patti ascribes for not going to the United States is her dread of sea sickness. So accomplished a cantatrice should be tolerably comfortable on the high C's.

Mr and Mrs Kendal terminated their engagement at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, Liverpool, on Saturday evening. They were succeeded, on Monday, by Herr and Mrs Bandmann.

A new three-act comedy, by M. Edmond Gondinet, entitled Le Panache, is in active preparation at the Palais Royal. The chief parts will be filled by MM. Brasseur and Geoffroy.

Prof. Hart, of Cornell University, has been offered 16,000 dollars a-year to act as Government Geologist to Brazil. It's a pretty good place, where the principal product of the earth is diamonds.

Messrs Macmillan and Co. promise a new edition of Mr Matthew Arnold's "Essays on Criticism," to which will be added a paper "On a Persian Passion Play," reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine.

An International Choral Competition was lately held at Brussels. The first prize went to France, won by the Orphéon of Valenciennes, the second to a Belgian society, the third to a German Männergesangverin, and the fourth to a Dutch Liedertafel.

Before quitting Lyons, whither he had gone to do his one month's duty as a Resarvist, M. Lasalle, of the Grand Opera, gave a concert for the benefit of the families of his poorer temporary comrades. All the civil and military authorities were present, and a very respectable amount was netted.

One of the first daguerreotype proofs, taken by the inventor himself on the 2nd October, 1838, and representing a view of the Pavilion de Flore at the Tuileries, and a part of the gallery facing the river, from the Quai Voltaire, has just been presented to the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers.

Dumas' knowledge of American natural history is illustrated in his new novel, in which a 'coon, as big as a yearling calf, chases two lovers up a tree and then tries to gnaw through the trunk to bring it down. But for the simplicity of the tale, the distinguished author might be suspected of friendly satire upon the habits of American lovers.

A new historical play, entitled A Crown for Love, in which the loves of Anne Boleyn and Henry VIII. form a conspicuous feature, was to be produced at the Gaiety Theatre this morning. The principal parts are sustained by Messrs Ryder, W. Rignold, Charles Harcourt, W. Herbert, Maclean, F. Roland; Miss Evelyn, Mrs Leigh, &c.

A prize has been offered for the best Spanish National Hymn, the hymns of Riego, Espartero, Prim, Pierrad, and others, not being deemed suitable under the present government. All manuscripts will have to be sent in to the offices of the Ayuntamiento, Madrid, before the 15th December. This probably applies to the text only; the turn of the music will come next.

A contemporary states that Mr F. H. Cowen, busy with his cantata, The Corsair, for Birmingham, will not be able to finish his promised oratorio, The Deluge, in time for Brighton. A cantata, which Mr John Francis Barnett has been commissioned to write for the Brighton Festival of 1877, is to be ready for performance next February instead. The subject is The Good Shepherd.

The New Shakspere Society held its opening meeting of the session on the 1st inst., at University College, Gower Street. The papers read were:—I. "Notes on Mr Daniel's Theory of the relation between the first and second quartos of Romeo and Juliet" by James Spedding, Esq., M.A., Hon. Fellow, Trin. Coll., Camb. II. "On Shakspere's Elf-Locks," by J. Wickham Legg, Esq., M.D.

A contemporary reports an accident to the organist of St Paul's Cathedral. Dr Stainer was playing "fives" the week before last at St Michael's, Tenby, where he and other musical men were staying with Sir Frederick Ouseley, when the ball struck his face, severely injuring one of his eyes. Dr Stainer was ordered to keep away from light for at least ten days, and there is decided hope of the ultimate recovery of the sight.

The Drury Lane pantomime, supported by the Vokes family, is this year to be Whittington and his Cat. Covent Garden will present a new version of the old stories of Goody Two Shoes and Cinderella. The Crystal Palace will have Jack and the Beanstalk for its subject; and the first pantomime produced at the Alexandra Palace will be The Yellow Dwarf, for which the services of Mr George Conquest and his son are secured.

Nine of the actors who left Europe, for Rio de Janeiro, to play in the Chatte Blanche, have died from yellow fever. The manager, who received 400,000 reis (350 reis are equal to 1fr.) from the Emperor, to whose presence he was admitted, and 200,000 reis from the Count d'Eu, to facilitate the return of the company, died on board the steamer. At the Alcazar de Rio, 15 singers out of the 27 have also succumbed to the same.

ATHENÆUM (Camden Town).—Miss Lillie Albrecht, whose performances delighted the audience last season, opened the series of concerts, to be given during the present season, on Friday last, and by her fine performance of Chopin's Tarentelle in A flat, evidently delighted her audience. A Sonata of Beethoven's played by Miss Albrecht, was even more admired—the slow movement being rendered with refined taste. The gifted young artist received a well-merited recall at the conclusion, for which she gracefully bowed her thanks.

Madame Cave Ashton has been singing at Mr Sims Reeves ballad concert, at the Free Trade Hall Manchester, with success. The Manchester Courier praises her highly, and records that she possesses a mezzo-soprano voice of considerable power. "It is sympathetic in its character, her style also is good, and betokens careful training and judicious study. Her delivery is marked with considerable dramatic power, and this quality, added to her more than average flexibility of voice, commended her singing to the audience, and secured for her a well-deserved encore in Sir Julius Benedict's song, "The bird that came in Spring."

ZARÉ THALBERG.—The Royal Italian Opera provincial tour began on Monday last at Dublin. Don Giovanni was selected for the opening performance at the Theatre Royal, and drew a large attendance. The Dublin papers speak highly of M. Maurel (Don Giovanni), Signor Scolari (Leporello), Signor Tagliafico (Masseto), and Mr Richard Seymour, a Dublin amateur, who at short notice performed the rôle of Ottavio, in place of Signor Pavani—indisposed. The Donna Anna was Madame Paoli; the Elvira, Mdlle Ghiotti. Mdlle. Thalberg, as Zerlina, made a brilliant success, and at once obtained from the enthusiastic Dublin amateurs a confirmation of the favourable judgment formed of her in London The Irish Times says that "the clear, beautiful notes of her exquisite voice charmed her hearers from the very commencement," and that her sweetness, tenderness, and genuineness of feeling were "either the perfection of art, or the outcome of a spontaneous impulse which is the half-sister of genius." The Daily Express records the "complete success of this truly gifted girl." The Freeman's Journal says she is "original, delightful, satisfying. Her singing, in the 'La ci darem' was perfection itself, and her acting was prettiness itself." We were the first to testify to the merits of this charming young artist, and are glad to record her first provincial triumph.—Observer, Oct. 10.

There is no branch of natural history more attractive than the study of birds, and there is none perhaps more perplexing at the outset to the young naturalist. If he have only learned about birds from books, he will be annoyed to discover that many a ploughboy knows far more about their habits than he does, and even if he can boast the advantage of a good ear, his want of practice will place him far behind the rustic in trying to discover a songster by its note. It would appear that of the large number of persons who profess a love for song-birds very few comparatively have the ear to distinguish a song unless they can see the author of it; and that the only way to learn the song of a bird is to approach it as noiselessly as possible. There are people who, in spite of considerable effort, are never able to learn the first lesson in ornithology, just as there are people whose musical ear is so deficient that they are unable to hum a tune correctly. Mr Harting mentions the fact that, in 1872, a series of observations were made in various parts of England and Scotland with regard to the habits of some migratory birds. Thirty species were observed, and the results were remarkable. The first swallow seen was on the 2nd of March, four miles south of Glasgow, the earliest record of its arrival in Scotland, and one naturalist states that on the 13th of April there were nightingales on the beach, under the bathing machines, along the whole length of the shore at Brighton.* [Handel died on the 13th of April; and Sterndale Bennett was born on the 13th of April.—D. P.]

PRAGUE.—M. Anton Rubinstein has been staying here for some time to superintend the getting up of his opera, Die Maccabäer, which will be produced very shortly.

NAPLES.—A three-act comic opera, La Campana dell'Eremitaggio, words by Sig. E. Coffino, music by Sig. E. Sarria, has been successfully produced at the Teatro Mercadante.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

MACBETH AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

Our visit to the second Shakespearean revival at the Lyceum Theatre was purposely deferred until we had had the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the opinions of the critical world. It is impossible to dispute the fact that the Macbeth of Mr Henry Irving has been laid under general censure; disparaged by some, its deficiencies are condoned by others; but throughout the tone of the criticisms there is lacking that sympathy between the judges and the judged requisite to prove that the result was, according to these particular views, in the least degree satisfactory. Our opinion of Mr Irving's performance is unique, since we give him credit at the offset for having brought upon the stage the Macbeth that Shakespeare designed when planning his tragedy, and for having persistently ignored the conventional, or actor's, view of the character.

What reader, studying the text of Macbeth, can find a single circumstance in the entire dramatic narrative calculated to instil into our minds one feeling of sympathy with, or respect for, Macbeth? On some hands it is accepted as sufficient proof of the Scottish usurper's innate nobility of character, that he was chivalrous and brave in combat. But these were general qualities in the epoch when Macbeth lived and fought, and we can no more accept them in his case as indications of a noble mind than we can assign elevation of intellect to the modern savage, whose one instinct is success or death in battle. That Macbeth is no poltroon, however, we have abundant evidence. It has been the theatrical fashion to invest him with imaginary virtues—to make of him a demi-god by right of the prowess of his arm, and to smother the heinousness of his crimes beneath the assumed chivalry of his nature. The stage reading of the tragedy and that which belongs to the closet of the student are thus opposed; Macbeth, indeed, possesses a most vivid and poetic imagination, but this is his only redeeming quality. As a matter of course, an actor wishes to make the most of the capital invested in his hands, and a dramatic assumption is a thing to be studied and treated so as to yield the greatest amount of interest. A character must be rendered noticeable, if not attractive (though there is always a leaning towards the latter qualification), and the ordinary actor loses sight of the author's intention in seeking to reap honour for his own efforts. One of the greatest merits in Mr Irving's Macbeth is that it is not an actor's performance, in the general acceptance of the term. From beginning to end Mr Irving disdains to lower his art to the level of conventional precedent. He regards Macbeth in the same light as do those who have studied the character from the play itself, and not from the stage representation of it—as a merciless tyrant, a bloody usurper, with none of those specious attributes of good nature or bonhommie which make the stage Macbeth what it is—a weak reflection of a wondrous ideal. Shakespeare never intended that the central figure of this tragedy should be held up to popular admiration; on the contrary, his evident intent was to pourtray, in the most repulsive outlines, the man who, with every opportunity for good, shaped each course for evil. Were we to judge solely by the very conflicting evidence contained in the diction, we should come to no very decided opinion as to Macbeth's character, while those of Banquo and Lady Macbeth would be equally hard to divine. From the action of the play, however, in the portions with which Macbeth is intimately concerned, we have no other alternative than to regard him as a contemptible and despicable criminal, without a redeeming quality to lift his black soul out of the mire of moral degradation. This is the view taken by Mr Irving, and represented with extraordinary force and consistency throughout the play. After Macbeth's opening speech:

"So foul and fair a day I have not seen,"

he does not utter a single line that savours not of superstitious fear, or of moral or physical cowardice. The prognostications of the Witches strikes dread into his craven heart—not because he is afraid of the deed he has already contemplated so much as he is frightened by his intentions being known to others—even to such intangible beings as the three Witches. It is with a convulsive start that he hears himself hailed as the future king; and his involuntary action causes Banquo to remark:

"Good sir, why do you start; and seem to fear
Things that do sound so fair?"

Throughout the scene Macbeth is enshrouded in moody speculation; he keeps his soldiers waiting until Banquo's patience is exhausted; and though, when aroused from his day-dream, he speaks of holding fuller converse upon what hath chanced, "Our free hearts to each other," there is very little indication in his manner of his lightening his secret mind before his companions. Brought into the king's presence, and there loaded with honours, Macbeth is abashed and gloomy; Duncan's favours he accepts as though they were little better than insults—knowing how little he does deserve them—while the bestowal upon Malcolm of the title of Prince of Cumberland arouses all his worst passions. Notice the feverish impatience with which Macbeth takes his departure, with smooth words on his tongue that find no echo in his heart. Now is the moment that he is ready to do the deed; we can hear it in his voice ("Stars, hide your fires," &c.), and see it in his face. In this scene Mr Irving is remarkably fine. We next see him in the presence of Lady Macbeth; his courage has already cooled, and his purpose commenced to waver. Macbeth greets his wife with the words:

"My dearest love,
Duncan comes here to-night," but can return none but a coward's answer to the subtle inquiry; "And when goes hence?" Macbeth sneaks out of it pitifully with the miserable evasion, "To-morrow, as he purposes." Even when Lady Macbeth closes the matter, by offering to do the deed herself ("And you shall put this night's great business into my despatch"), Macbeth cannot raise his sinking spirits, but shuffles off the immediate responsibility, saying, "We will speak further." No wonder that the ire of the resolute woman is raised, and, with a disdainful voice, almost withering in its contemptuous scorn, she bids him "only" to "look up clear," and takes all the rest upon herself to achieve. It is not until the subsequent interview between the guilty partners that any evidence is given that Macbeth means to dabble in blood. In order, however, to "screw his courage to the sticking point," it is requisite for Lady Macbeth almost to unsex herself, and speak of the most frightful deeds with a complacency that is, to a contemplative mind, not only revolting, but disgusting. Lady Macbeth, however, knows but one end to her ambition, and that end justifies any means she may use. She has to employ strong words ere the dormant energy of her husband's nature is aroused; but, when she has led him on by devilish wiles to imagine that the guilt will not fall upon the evil-doers, she knows she has him safe. Up to the last it was requisite for the woman to offer to participate in the deed itself:

"What, cannot you and I perform upon
The unguarded Duncan?"

Here occurs a point which Mr Irving seems wilfully to pass by. The final note of Duncan's knell is sounded when Macbeth exclaims:

"Bring forth men children only;
For thy undaunted mettle should compose
Nothing but males."

There is scarcely the need for him afterwards to say, "I am settled," for we all know that his determination is irrevocably fixed.

We may pass over all that comes between this episode and the absolute committal of the crime. Macbeth has disappeared behind the arras, bent on his murderous work, and Lady Macbeth comes upon the scene, eagerly awaiting the result. She hears Macbeth's smothered cry as he descends from the chamber of blood, and fears that he has failed. Macbeth, with a dripping dagger in either hand, totters in, in a state of mental and physical prostration, approaching to imbecility. The blow has been struck, and immediately his superstitious brain has filled the world with a teeming host of horrors which threaten him with destruction. He is overwhelmed with fear, his trembling knees knock together, his mouth is a-gape, his eyes wide open and fixed upon the tell-tale weapons he holds in his hands.

He speaks to Lady Macbeth as one dazed, and speaks in a low and stifled voice as though communing with himself. The picture is truly awful. The very extent of his terror is reached when he says:

"Methought I heard a voice cry, 'Sleep no more!
Macbeth doth murder sleep, the innocent sleep!'"

Rooted to the spot, motionless, save for the tremor that pervades his frame, almost voiceless and horror-stricken, the guilty wretch seems to read aloud his doom:

"Sleep no more, Macbeth shall sleep no more!"

The tone in which the words are given is hoarse, and the words themselves are almost inarticulate. The power of this scene is immense, and Mr Irving rises to the situation with a force that is positively appalling. If this be not, indeed, the true representation of the play as Shakespeare intended it, his conception was never before so closely approached. To us it seems a perfect realization of the revulsion of feeling after the commital of so heinous an act as that of murder. Macbeth is here no hero, but a weak and conscience-stricken mortal. Mr Irving represents him as purely human; here is his first step in crime, and here are the immediate results. Finer acting it is impossible to conceive, even though the emotions be represented with such realistic truth as to fill the spectators with abhorrence.

The banquet scene, in the third act, is another instance of wonderful acting on Mr Irving's part, and here, indeed, he is well supported by Miss Bateman. It must be remembered that Mr Irving's style is more dependent upon the realization of character than upon any special elocutionary qualifications, albeit he possesses these in a marked degree. Macbeth is king, but he has descended to become a miserable trafficker in murder, and his life is eaten away, as it were, between his ever present fears and his unholy aspirations. Never did a crown shine on a more craven brow. The abject terror, with which Macbeth regards the apparition of Banquo, yields to nothing in the performance. It is absolutely electrical; the man's functions seem paralysed, and he mumbles rather than speaks the words (a wretched subterfuge again):

"Thou canst not say I did it."

Upon the second appearance of the ghost, the effect upon Macbeth's already deranged intellect is maddening; and, in a frenzy of fear, he wraps his mantle around his head to shut out the fearsome sight. This is another marvellous point made by the actor.

Here we may allude, parenthetically, to the suggestion made some time since, that on the second appearance of the ghost it should take the form, not of Banquo, but of Duncan. The remark, "Thy bones are marrowless," could hardly apply to Banquo, and the wish that the ghost may "take any shape but that" would seem to point an allusion to Macbeth's first crime. There is undoubted ingenuity in the thought that prompted this alteration, although it may not be received as worthy of practical adoption.

Macbeth's visit to the Witches, in the fourth act, is remarkably effective. The stage represents a dark cavern, illumined only by the flickering of the cauldron, around which the hags chant their unholy spells. The cave is below the level of the heath, and Macbeth appears high above, in bold relief against the bright moon and starry sky. The evil influence of the Witches is soon apparent; Macbeth curses all those who trust them, and his nature undergoes another change—still for evil. Witness his words:

"The flighty purpose never is o'ertook,
Unless the deed go with it: From this moment
The very firstlings of my heart shall be
The firstlings of my hand."

Of the last act we have not much to say. Macbeth, torn with internal passions, and wasted with the fever of a tormenting conscience, has grown old, withered, and prematurely grey. His life knows no quiet, his mind is in one continual state of unrest. When the wood of Birnam does come to Dunsinane, and when Macbeth, hounded down, is brought to bay by the man who was not born of woman, the belief in the Witches, which was before his armour of proof, falls down and leaves him totally defenceless. We cannot see in the final encounter between Macbeth and Macduff anything to praise, as a stage fight, pure and simple. What is done is perfectly natural. Macbeth is a worn, spent man; he is nerved for the encounter by despair; but Macduff can see he is powerless. A few furious cuts, and his wrist begins to tire; his target is then flung away, and, grasping the right wrist with his left hand, Macbeth "lays on" (which, as a matter of fact, Macduff never does, in spite of the exhortation) with what strength remains. Soon his arm falls powerless, and Macduff performs the impossible feat of running him through his shirt of mail with a blunt-pointed broadsword. It ought to be a cut, and not a thrust, that disposes of the usurper.

We have left ourselves scanty space to pass in review the many excellencies that characterize the revival of Macbeth at the Lyceum. But, though much has been done for the tragedy in the matter of mounting by a very liberal management, it is only the marvellous acting of Mr Irving that leaves a lasting impression upon the mind of the spectator. That this effort of the young tragedian, though not accepted as such, is in reality the triumph of his career up to the present time, we do not doubt for a moment. We will go further, and say that we scarcely imagine that the English dramatic stage has ever witnessed a more graphic impersonation, nor one in which an actor displayed such a thorough reverence for the highest claims of his art.

Miss Bateman is remarkably fine in the banquet scene, but wants vitality in the early portions of the play. Her performance, however, is, as will be imagined, of a high order, and reveals the exceptional gifts of the actress, even where it fails to show them at their best. Of the rest of the cast Mr Forrester is certainly the best, his Banquo being notable for its firm, steady elocution, and sensible, unaffected acting. Mr Swinbourne's Macduff is not one of his happiest efforts. His delivery of the phrase:

"What, all my pretty chickens and their dam

was given as a crescendo, mf to fff; the effect was not striking by reason of its excellence. The Witches are good (though we do not care for the arrangement of the first scene), and the curious fact of their voices being of different pitch, and forming a triad, makes their mysterious incantations sound more unearthly than one could imagine. Another feature must not escape notice; the soldiers are indeed soldiers, and not the usual mob of shambling supers. The scenery is well arranged, though, of course, stone castles in Scotland during the reign of Macbeth are anachronisms. The music should be suppressed altogether, unless something less suggestive of German bands, a little more Scottish in tendency, and rather more illustrative of the spirit of the tragedy can be provided. At present the music is the weakest part of the revival. R.

'PUDET HÆC OPPROBRIA NOBIS ET DICI POTUISSE, ET NON POTUISSE REFELLI."—Horace.

("We're all the way from Manchester, and we've not got the Work to do.")

A southern flood in northern town
The parish Bridge once swept away,
The parish rulers cunningly
In solemn conclave met to say:
We'll advertise for estimates
To fill the place as best we may;
But all the time 'tis our intent
To job the job "another way."
And while contractors offers send,
Each doubting not to win the race,
They sneak'd a log of Yankee Pyne
And laid it in the Bridge's place.

BREMEN.—A new opera, Das Märchen von der schönen Melusine, by Herr Theodor Hentschel, is in active rehearsal at the Stadttheater, where the composer officiates as first Capellmeister. The libretto is founded on the same story as that of Herr Gramann's opera, Melusine, recently produced at the Theatre Royal, Wiesbaden. The scenery, for which Schwind's well-known frescoes have served as models, has been painted by Herr Lütkemeyer, of Coburg.

ARTICLE I.—DUTIES OF OFFICERS—(continued)

SECT. 6. The Executive Committee and the other officers shall constitute the Board of Directors of the Union, and it shall be their duty to supervise the general interests of the same; investigate all charges against a member or members; call for papers and witnesses; have the power to cause a member or members who have violated the laws to appear before them; receive applications for membership; pass upon all candidates; grant donations in urgent cases; remit or reduce fines; leave questions for the Union at large to decide; pass all bills against the Union, and report all their action or decisions at the following quarterly meeting. The President or Vice-President shall preside at their meetings, but in their absence they may elect their own Chairman. They shall make such rules for their own government as are not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter, and hold, if required, monthly meetings, but special meetings may be called by the President at his discretion, or at the written request of five members. Seven members shall constitute a quorum.

SECT. 7. The duties of the Executive Committee shall be to meet and act, together with the other officers of the Union, for its best interests.

SECT. 8. Any officer neglecting to attend three successive meetings of the Board, when notified by the Secretary, his seat shall be declared vacant, and the Board shall have the power to appoint some one to fill the vacancy until the next regular quarterly meeting of the Union, unless an acceptable excuse shall be rendered by said member.

ARTICLE II.—MEMBERSHIP.

SECT. 1. All professional Instrumental performers in New York City and vicinity shall be eligible for membership, all of which to be subject to the discretion of the Board of Directors.

SECT. 2. All applications for membership must be made through a member of this Union, and must in all cases be accompanied by the admission fee and the dues of the current quarter, which will be refunded if the applicant is rejected.

SECT. 3. The admission fee for membership shall be 5 dols.

SECT. 4. Every applicant, on being admitted, shall sign the Constitution and By-laws, thereby agreeing to support the same, and pay all legal demands against him. He shall also furnish the Secretary with his place of residence, and the name of the instrument or instruments which he plays upon.

SECT. 5. It shall be the duty of every member, when he changes his residence, to report to the Secretary within one week; by failing to do so, he shall be fined fifty cents for each and every like offence.

SECT. 6. Membership shall in all cases date from the first day of the current quarter.

ARTICLE III.—DUTIES OF MEMBERS.

SECT. 1. It shall be the duty of every member to refuse all engagements tendered him by any musician not connected with this Union, with the exception of Conductors, or Directors of Theatrical Orchestras or Concerts, and to refuse to perform in any orchestra or band in which any person or persons are engaged who are not members.

SECT. 2. It shall be deemed a high offence against the Constitution and By-laws of this Union for a member of the same to employ or engage, or assist to an engagement, a non-member of this Union. It shall be a like offence to play for less than the fixed or stipulated prices of this Union. All infringements of the above provisions it shall be the bounden duty of every member of this Union to report immediately to the Secretary. And also to inform against all or any delinquent member or members for transgressing any article or articles of this Constitution or its By-laws; and, failing so to do, said member will be liable to the same fine as the offending party, should said member or members be at any time brought to a trial for said delinquency.

SECT. 3. Every member shall pay fifty cents quarterly dues in advance; and should cases of emergency arise or cause any further demands to be made to defray any of the necessary expenses, an additional tax may be levied.

SECT. 4. A member, bringing a charge against another member before the Board of Directors, shall be required to appear personally to substantiate his charge. The Secretary shall notify the defendant to appear before them, to defend himself against the charge made, and, if found guilty, shall be fined accordingly.

SECT. 5. It shall be the duty of every member on entering the meeting to sign his name to the roll, and, failing so to do, shall not have the privilege of speaking or voting on any question before the meeting.

MR CARL ROSA'S OPERA COMPANY.

The revival of Balfe's first English opera, The Siege of Rochelle, answers its purpose for the moment, but can hardly lead to any definite results. Through its means, however, we made acquaintance with one who was among the earliest of the actual period to convince the artistic world that English opera, in a developed form, was just as possible as Italian, French, or German. Of what progress music has made in this country during the forty years that have elapsed since the Siege of Rochelle was first produced by Mr Alfred Bunn, at Drury Lane Theatre, amateurs need not be reminded. The revival of this work—pioneer, in its way, of so much that was to follow—is, therefore, more interesting on that account than on account of its own absolute merits. The libretto, one of the least intelligibly wrought out from the pen of the prolific Fitzball, is here, as in almost every instance, derived from a foreign source; while the music presents but few indications of that marked style which subsequently distinguished Balfe from his contemporaries, and encouraged the persuasion that he, too, after his peculiar manner, was a more or less original composer. That the Siege of Rochelle can ever again keep the stage, as in years gone by, we do not believe; nor are we called upon at this period of its existence to describe it in detail. The performance at the Princess's Theatre, under Mr Rosa's direction, is, for the most part, exceedingly good. The character of the pensive Clara could hardly be more gracefully embodied than by Mdlle Torriani, nor the lively Marcella more spiritedly pourtrayed than by Miss Julia Gaylord, a young débutante from whom much may reasonably be expected. Mr C. Lyall's Corporal Schwartz is instinct with the quiet unforced humour which has ever been a characteristic of this genial and accomplished artist; while Mr Santley's Michel, looked upon either vocally or dramatically, is not easy to surpass. Of Mr D. H. Bates, the young tenor, to whom was entrusted the part of Valmour, we would rather speak on some future occasion. Nervousness overcame him; and at the second performance Mr Nordblom took his place. The other characters are sustained by Mrs Aynsley Cook, Miss Laura Hyde, Messrs Snazelle, Ludwig, and Aynsley Cook. The orchestra and chorus are throughout efficient; the opera is well put on the stage, and a success may not unfairly be recorded. At the same time, while the Bohemian Girl (with its unimportant Parisian additions), Maritana, and even the English versions of Fra Diavolo and Faust, are welcome enough, it was generally expected that Mr Rosa would produce at least one original work by an English composer; and what English composer would not be charmed to write an opera expressly for a theatre where Miss Rose Hersee and Mr Santley are among the leading members of the company? The Porter of Havre proved (if proof had been necessary) what Mr Santley can do; but that again was an exportation from abroad. Nevertheless, and on the other side, amateurs still anxiously expect the promised adaptation of Cherubini's admirable Deux Journées, under the title of the Water-Carrier (a porter, by the way, of very different kind from the porter of Signor Cagnoni). The brief series of performances is drawing rapidly to a close.—Graphic.

NUREMBERG.—One of the members of the operatic company at the Stadttheater is Herr Gum, from Munich. This young artist is said to be a phenomenal tenor, singing the C, and even C Sharp in alt. with the greatest ease. The local papers, in glowing terms, assert that, when more proficient as an actor, he will occupy a high position.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

One of the principal events at the Royal Operahouse lately has been the re-appearance of Mad. Mallinger, as Valentine, in Les Huguenots, a character she assumed for the first time, but the performance was not a great success. The papers are pretty unanimous in their opinions about it. This is what the Echo says:—

"That this lady who, in a certain sphere, has done so much, should seek to extend her range of characters, which she has already rendered so varied, is a fact deserving due appreciation and praise. Besides appearing in the female Wagnerian creations of Eva, Elsa, and Elisabeth, she undertakes the oft-repeated parts of Iphigenia, Agatha, Euryanthe, Margarethe, Susanne, Zerlina, Mrs Ford, Leonore, Aida, etc.; she sings Gluck, Mozart, Weber, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, Nicolai, Verdi, Wagner, etc. Meyerbeer alone had hitherto been sent empty away. Our Prima Donna was, perhaps, not altogether wrong in avoiding this composer; she might have feared that the grapes which hung so high were not of the sweetest. Mad. Mallinger by no means possesses an abundance of the qualities by which the character of Valentine can be informed with warm life. Her voice is deficient in power and readiness, her acting wants passion and fire. The sensuous sentimentality of Wagner's female characters is satisfied with very different powers of impersonation than those requisite for the warm and glowing life of Valentine; amorous plaints and yearning sighs are not heard from Valentine's lips, which breathe greater vigour. They do not sing patient suffering and abnegation; every tone they utter excites to action. Mad. Mallinger had, therefore, a difficult task to execute, and, as far as her strength went, her rendering of the part as a whole deserves unconditional praise. The case would be different were we to pass in review the principal points separately. The duet with Marcel would at once afford grounds for much censure, since, here especially it was manifest how little the lady's powers corresponded to the task undertaken by her. Nor was the admirer of this grand piece agreeably impressed by the lady's going back to the ending formerly in vogue; the cut usually made here was certainly beneficial to the entire piece. In the grand duet of the fourth act, Mad. Mallinger was better, though anything like the perfection of Mad. Lucca was quite out of the question. All the little touches of emotion and sweet complainings, which, it is true, are scattered only sparingly through the number, had full justice done them, but the tones of passionate and glowing love, and of the bitter torture of the soul, were passed over almost unnoticed, so that we did not see a living impersonification of Valentine, but something entirely sacrificed to minor details. We hardly think, therefore, that Mad. Mallinger will ever master the part. Her natural gifts are not sufficiently eminent. The public, though in a grateful mood, appeared, despite the bouquets flung down, to be of the same opinion as ourselves, and, after the last act, dispersed in silence. In various parts of the house, however, especially in the third tier, a number of violent claqueurs were strikingly prominent."

Mad. Mallinger would certainly have acted more wisely had she left the part alone. Not only is it unfitted for her naturally, but her appearance in it gave rise to inevitable comparisons; and comparisons, we know, "are oderous." The other leading parts were sustained, more or less satisfactorily, by Herren Niemann, Betz, and Krolop. Herr Eckert conducted.

Miss Minnie Hauck has appeared most successfully, as Angela, in the Domino Noir, which, thanks to her admirable rendering, has entered upon a new lease of popularity. Sooth to say, however, she was, on the whole, wretchedly supported, and the manner in which Auber's sparkling score was represented in its entirety reflected no lustre on such an establishment as the Royal Operahouse.

During a recent visit to Leipsic, his Excellency Herr von Hülsen, Intendant-General, concluded an agreement with Herr William Müller, "heroic" tenor at the Stadttheater. By this agreement, Herr Müller, who formerly belonged to the company at the Theatre Royal, Hanover, will sing at the Royal Operahouse in the course of the winter. Should he come up to the expectations entertained of him, he will be permanently engaged. Another candidate for the same honour is Herr Georg Schröter, from Hamburgh. Herr Schröter is a "lyric" tenor, and will be put to the test some time this month. Herr Kannberg, alias Herr Müller (Müller is not an uncommon name in Germany), not being considered up to the mark, will most probably resume his business as a bookseller; at any rate, he will not be engaged by Herr von Hülsen.

Herr Paul Taglioni's new ballet, entitled Madeleine, is being actively rehearsed. It will be produced, with Mdlle Adele Grantzow in the principal part, on the 4th November, Herr Taglioni's fiftieth professional anniversary, or a few day's later. The title is not particularly taking, but it will probably be changed before the first night, according to the usual practice of the respected "Herr Ballet-Director."

Reports of a Prima Donna feud have lately appeared in the papers, it being asserted that Mad. von Voggenhuber was at daggers drawn with Mad. Mallinger, because she (Mad. Mallinger) had taken the part of Valentine in Les Huguenots. There is, however, no foundation for these reports. It is true that Mad. von Voggenhuber was put in possession of the said part, but in consideration of her appearing in that of Elsa, which was the property of Mad. Mallinger, she consented to share the part of Valentine with the latter lady, and, during the season, the two ladies will play the two parts alternately. So much for the Prima Donna feud.

Herr Louis Brassin has resigned his post as first teacher of the Violin in Stern's Conservatory, and accepted an offer to conduct the Classical Concerts at Breslau, and take the first violin part in the Quartet Performances of the Breslau Tonkünstler-Verein.

Herr Fricke, of the Royal Operahouse, has married Mad. Steinway, the widow of the well-known pianoforte maker of the same name.

TERPSICHORE.

A little volume is about to be published, in Paris, entitled Terpsichore, the preface to which will be certain to draw attention to it, whatever may be the merits of the book itself. The introduction is from the pen of Mdlle Rita Sangalli, the première danseuse of the Opera. Now, there are very few ladies of her profession who have ever cared to give up their pink tights for the sake of a blue stocking, and some of her remarks will on this account be read with interest. She begins by lamenting the decadence of the grand ballet, and seeks its cause in the fact that dancing now is chiefly confined to divertissements in operas. She quotes Scribe's remark that for a drama to be good it ought to be capable of being represented without words, and she reverses the observation by asserting, very justly, that a good ballet must, if words be added to it, make a good piece. Mdlle Sangalli might have added in corroboration of her assertion that some of the best opera libretti have been built upon ballet plots. Remarking on the little interest taken now-a-days in the mimetic art, she observes that it is because dancers "pay no attention to the language of the eyes or to the imitation of such simple and graceful attitudes as we see on Greek and Roman bas-reliefs." Here Mdlle Sangalli begs the question. She seems to forget that the "simple attitudes" to be found on Greek masterpieces are the ne plus ultra of plastic art, and the modern sculptors are even farther behind their ancient prototypes than are the danseuses of to-day behind the Taglioni, Herbele, Fanny Ellsler, Cerrito, Carlotta Grisi (facile princeps), &c., of our youth. Referring to the much-vexed question in lands where stage-dancing is still cultivated, as to whether men should be employed, or should be supplanted by women in male attire, Mdlle Sangalli maintains that men are "absolutely indispensable in ballets. A man"—she says—"contrasts better than a travesti—that is to say, a lady in man's clothes—can do, with the grace and beauty of the woman. But, while man is indispensable in pas d'ensemble and groups, he is useless in soli." In this opinion everybody will agree. Nothing is more distasteful to Englishmen than the sight of the male dancers who twist and turn about in the long ballets of which the Italians are so fond. Mdlle Sangalli's last remarks must be given in her own words. "There is a tendency," she says, "to replace the want of cultivation in the choregraphic art by another deficiency—that of costume. It is not for nothing that the tulle of which our skirts are made is called tulle-illusion. By abandoning these skirts, and by substituting for them flesh-coloured drawers, aux couleurs chatoyantes, charm and "illusion" are alike dispelled.

DARMSTADT.—The Grand-Duke has issued an order forbidding the Ducal Theatre the interpolation of pieces into operas. This extends to "stars."

(Extract from a private letter.")

* * * * "You will not be surprised to know that Albani has made a very strong and favourable impression on the Irish. In fact she has created a furore. There was great curiosity about Lohengrin; but I think one performance satiated the appetite. You may imagine what could be done with a small chorus, small orchestra, and scanty rehearsal—all incidents of our position. The principals were uniformly good, and did their very best; but Lohengrin demands more. All the other operas have been successful. Albani has won the hearts of the people, and deservedly, for she spares neither time nor strength. Zaré Thalberg has shown remarkable talent, while her fresh voice and piquant manner have delighted the people. Bianchi, also, has played in La Fille du Régiment with great success. Our old acquaintance, Fraulein Edelsberg, has pleased here very much with her real dramatic talent. We have, also, Naudin, Maurel, Pavani, and Medica (a barytone with a splendid voice)—altogether a good working company."—J. P.

MUSIC AT VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

M. Monplaisir's romantic ballet of Brahma, got up under his personal supervision, has been produced at the Imperial Operahouse. M. Monplaisir and Mdlle Linda, première danseuse, were called on repeatedly. The new scenery, by Brioschi, is fine, and the mise-en-scène, generally, effective. The first performance of Bizet's Carmen was announced for the 17th inst.

The "Artists' Evenings" of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde will be resumed on the 6th November, in the Society's large hall, which has been redecorated. It is probable that several Singspiele, or dramatic pieces, interspersed with songs, will be performed in the course of the winter. The programme of the grand concerts, under the direction of the new conductor, Herr Herbeck, is already published. The four regular concerts are fixed to take place respectively on the 14th November, 5th December, 27th February, and 19th March. The following are the works selected: "Ach, wie flüchtig!" for chorus and orchestra, Bach; Triple Concerto and Violin Concerto, Beethoven; Symphony (new) Bruckner; St Cecilia Ode, Handel; "Chorwerk," Hagar; Symphony in G., Haydn; "Volkslied und Reigen," for Solos, Chorus, and Orchestra (new), Herbeck; nine Choruses, "a capella;" "Chorus of Reapers and Vine Dressers," with Orchestra, Liszt; "Lobgesang," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Flute and Harp, with Orchestra; "Quis Te comprehendat?" and "Miserecordias," two Choruses, with Orchestra and Organ, Mozart; two Orchestral Pieces, Rufinatscha; Pianoforte Concerto, St Léon; and Songs scored for Orchestra, Schubert. At the extra concerts, on the 6th January and the 11th April, Haydn's Creation and Franz Liszt's Elizabeth are promised.

Beethoven, as most musicians know, breathed his last in the house called the "Schwarzspanier-Haus," on the Alsergrund. The Heiligenkreuz Foundation, to which the building belongs, has had a stone memorial tablet fixed over the doorway. On the tablet is the following inscription, in gold letters: "Beethoven's Sterbehaus, gest. 26 Marz 1827," which may be freely translated "Beethoven died in this House, the 26th March, 1827."

ACORNS, SLOES, AND BLACKBERRIES.

BY GIBBS GIBB GIBBS, ESQ.

No. 17.

AMBROGIO MINOJA, chapelmaster and honorary member of the Conservatory at Milan, was born in 1752. He studied music at Naples under Nicolo Sala, and, on returning to his country, was first pianist at the Theatre Della Scala, at Milan. He composed a march and a funeral symphony in honour of General Hoche, and obtained from General Buonaparte the prize of a gold medal, value one hundred sequins, which he had offered for the best composition on that occasion. At the epoch of the coronation of Napoleon, as King of Italy, Minoja composed a Veni Creator and a Te Deum, which were performed in the Cathedral at Milan by an orchestra of two hundred and fifty musicians.

MICHAEL MONTECLAIR was born in the year 1666, at Audelot, a town of Bassigny, about ten miles from Chaumont. Monteclair was the first person who introduced the violone or double-bass into the orchestra of the opera. He died near St Denis in the year 1737. He was originally a teacher of music in Paris, but was afterwards taken into the Royal Academy. He composed the music to the celebrated opera of Jepthe, written by Pellegrini, and represented at Paris in the year 1732.

CLAUDIO MONTEVERDE, of Cremona, Chapelmaster of the Church of St Mark, at Venice, was a celebrated composer of motets and madrigals, who flourished about the beginning of the seventeenth century. He was well-known for his skill in recitative; indeed, he may be said to have been one of the inventors; at least there are no examples of recitative extant more ancient than those in his opera of Orfeo. He was the first who used double discords such as $\frac{9}{4}$, $\frac{9}{7}$, and $\frac{7}{4}$, as well as the flat fifth and the seventh unprepared. In his secular productions, by quitting ecclesiastical modulation, he determined the key of each movement, smoothed and phrased the melody, and made all his parts sing in a more natural and flowing manner than had been done by any of his predecessors. In his fifth and last book of madrigals, almost every species of discord and modulation is hazarded, for the use of which the boldest composers of modern times have been often thought licentious.

THOMAS MOORE.—This celebrated poet and musical amateur was a native of Ireland. He completed his education at Trinity College, Dublin. He came to London, entered himself at the Temple, with a view to make the law his profession, and was called to the bar. Having translated the Odes of Anacreon, he published them with copious notes, in 1800. This work met with so favourable a reception from all who possessed a classical and poetical taste, that he seems to have been induced to abandon the law and devote himself to literature. In 1801 he gave to the press a volume of poems under the assumed name of Thomas Little, which soon passed through many editions. In 1804 he went to the Bermuda Islands, of which he was appointed Registrar, and he also visited the United States. Of the American character he formed a very unfavourable opinion. In 1813 appeared his exquisite songs to Sir John Stevenson's collection of Irish melodies. In 1817 came forth his great work on which he was known to have been long engaged. By the publication of "Lalla Rookh" he placed, beyond the possibility of a dispute, his claim to be ranked among the first of British poets. For this poem he is said to have received the sum of three thousand guineas.

Monday, November 15, 1875.	Monday, January 31, 1876.
Monday, November 22, 1875.	Monday, February 7, 1876.
Monday, November 29, 1875.	Monday, February 14, 1876.
Monday, December 6, 1875.	Monday, February 21, 1876.
Monday, December 13, 1875.	Monday, February 28, 1876.
Monday, January 10, 1876.	Monday, March 6, 1876.
Monday, January 17, 1876.	Monday, March 13, 1876.

The Director's Benefit (the Last Concert of the Season) takes place on Monday, April 10th.

Sixteen Subscription Morning Performances will be given on Saturdays, Nov. 13, 20, 27 ; December 4, 11, 18—1875 ; January, 15, 22, 29 ; February, 5, 12, 19, 26 ; March 4, 11, and 18—1876.

For the accommodation of those who may desire to occupy the same seat at each performance, the Director will continue to issue Subscription Tickets at £3 10s. (transferable), entitling holders to special sofa stalls, selected by themselves, for the whole series of 16 Monday Evening Concerts, extending from Monday, November 8, to March 13. Subscription Tickets are also issued for the 16 Morning Concerts at £3 10s., extending from Saturday Afternoon, November 13, to March 18 : also for the 7 Morning Concerts taking place on Saturdays, January 15, 22, 29 ; February 5, 12, 19, and 26—at £1 10s.

Mdme ESSIPOFF will appear at these Concerts on Mondays, November 8, 15, and December 6 ; also on Saturdays, November 13 and December 4. Mdlle ANNA MEHLIG will be the pianist on Monday, November 22; and Mr CHARLES HALLE will appear on Monday, December 13, and on Saturday, December 11. Mdme NORMAN-NERUDA will be the violinist on Mondays, November 22 and 29 ; also on Saturdays, November 27, December 11 and 18. Herr WILHELMJ will make his first appearance on Monday, November 8th ; and M. SAINTON will lead on Saturday Afternoon, November 13. Signor PIATTI will hold the post of first violoncello on all occasions ; Herr L. RIES that of second violin ; Herr STRAUS or Mr ZERBINI will play viola ; Sir JULIUS BENEDICT and Mr ZERBINI, as heretofore, officiating as conductors. Mr SIMS REEVES is engaged for Saturday Afternoon, December 11, and Monday Evening, December 13. Mdme SCHUMANN, Mdlle MARIE KREBS, Miss AGNES ZIMMERMANN, Mr FRANKLIN TAYLOR, and Herr JOACHIM will appear after Christmas.

Applications respecting Subscriptions to be made to Chappell & Co. ; Mitchell ; Stanley Lucas & Co. ; Ollivier, Bond Street ; Keith & Co., Cheapside ; Hays, Royal Exchange Buildings ; Barr, Queen Victoria Street, E.C. ; and Austin, 28, Piccadilly.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE WHISTLING ALCHEMYST.—Received, with thanks, and many wishes for the come autumn and forthcoming winter. Likeness admirable.—Gave infinite satisfaction to the "elder Elder" and to the "younger Elder." Liszt is progressing ; and the shot-up will be shot down instanter to Frankfort-on-the-Maine (Hotel de Russie —best and pleasantest in Europe).

DR PUTT.—No. It was Hezekiah, not Ezekiel, that the late Henry Hugh Pierson set to music.

G. PLYMM.—"Ox minuet," no doubt—the rest questionable. Consult Anaximenes (or Anaximander) on other moot point.

DR SLYME.—Hardly so. Johannes Brahms is a mystic ; Robert Franz is one who accompanies others besides himself—unfortunately, sometimes, for J. S. Bach (see, or hear, clarinets, &c., in a certain cantata performed on Saturday last at the Crystal Palace).

DR HIFF.—Certainly, on one point ; Cherubini did inscribe Medée to his confrère, Méhul ; but it was Méhul himself who wrote Uthal and Stratonice. Dr Hiff is also wrong about Cherubini's Elise. It was Faniska that Beethoven admired so much.

OROZOOB.—The Buhrampoore Juggernaut is altogether wrong in talking of the Atzec melodies. The Atzecs had no melodies, but simply rhythmical howls. The inventors of arts and sciences, according to Syncellus (90 B.C.), were the sons of Seth (the "Egregori"). Read Abulfaragius concerning Enoch, otherwise Edris, who received thirty volumes. And yet Edris was not Enoch, but a son of Enoch's, and, moreover, the first calmographer (first who wrote with a pen). Cain was the first astronomer in theory. "Orozoob" is misled about the Egyptians. Ask W. Chappell, friend of Helmholtz.

A. N. HAMMER (Knt.).—We have already more than once advised our correspondents to place no trust in the reports to which Dr Serpent gives currency. Dr Serpent, though a Muttonian and member of the I. O. U. Club, is (by temperament) an audacious perverter of the truth ; and knows thoroughly well that Méhul was on the most friendly—nay affectionate—terms with Cherubini. Sir Hammer is mistaken about the Chopin concerto, as the subjoined will show :—"the pianoforte acts an almost independent part, the orchestra having little or nothing to do with the development of the cading themes" (and so on).

HOFFMANN TREYER.—Not precisely. Hoffmann was only a pretended friend of Weber's. He preferred, in his heart, the Spontini cravat. His (Hoffmann's) Undine is very different from the Ondine (or Undine) of Lamotte Fouqué—that little bit of sunshine which will be getting into your eyes. Mendelssohn, who treated Melusine, could alone have dealt with that bright, dim, shifting, shadowy, rainbowy, dazzling, evaporating, ethereal noncorporeal corporeality. Ask the author of the Three Louisas, and read Godwin's Essay on Sepulchres.

DR SHIPPING. Well—what about Chickering-Steinway?
DR QUINCE. Why—I wish 't had been Steinway-Chickering.
(Exeunt severally.)

—o—

WE take the following from the Pall Mall Gazette :—

"The Concordia gives an account of a spirited contest carried on between two eminent American pianoforte makers for the honour and profit of furnishing Dr von Bülow with instruments during his tour through the United States. Mr Steinway, who is understood to have contributed half of the very large sum paid by way of salary to Mr Rubinstein when the eminent Russian pianist was performing in the States, on condition of his operating exclusively on Steinway pianos, would, it was thought, make similar terms in regard to Dr von Bülow's engagement. Mr Ullmann, however, the well-known concert speculator and musical agent, who has taken Dr von Bülow for a certain period on lease, resolved that the question of the instrument to be played upon should be decided by public competition. No stipulation seems to have been required beforehand as to any particular kind or degree of excellence to be possessed by the pianos whose makers were to compete ; though it may fairly be assumed that a manufacturer would not agree to pay down several thousand pounds for the advantage of having his instruments placed before the public under the best possible conditions, unless he were quite convinced that they were distinguished by at least some points of superiority. It seems, however, to have been free to any pianoforte maker to purchase the services of the great Munich virtuoso. It soon became evident that the real struggle would be between the firm of Steinway and that of Chickering. Steinway, upon whose pianos the illustrious Rubinstein had hammered with such marked success, was determined that the equally famous von Bülow should strike no keyboard and snap no strings but those supplied by his firm. Chickering, on the other hand, was resolved not to be eclipsed by a rival hitherto fortunate, but who, as he had conquered on a previous occasion by force of money, might now by the same potent agency be defeated. Steinway stood on the defensive, and, in spite of a gallant resistance, was soon made to feel that he would have to draw heavily on his financial reserves to meet the vigorous offensive movement directed by the gallant Chickering. At last, in face of 20,000 dollars brought against him by his determined opponent, Steinway succumbed. But, though beaten at auction, he has since taken his revenge in the concert-room. The only hall in New York suitable for such performances as those which Dr von Bülow proposes to give belongs to Steinway, who naturally will not allow a Chickering piano to be brought within its walls. Dr von Bülow cannot play in the hall of Steinway on the piano of Chickering, and it seems that a Chickering concert-hall is now to be built for the sake of the Chickering piano, on which the great artist, who will henceforth be known as Chickering's pianist, is to play. Twenty thousand dollars is a great deal of money, and we do not think that any pianist lives who for such a sum would not gladly forsake either Broadwood for Erard, or Erard for Broadwood. The 20,000 pieces of silver for which Steinway seems to have been betrayed did not pass directly into the possession of Dr von Bülow. The contractor had agreed to pay him for his services a much larger sum; but the pecuniary value of a formal obligation to play on the pianos of one particular maker had of course been taken into account. It has been estimated that Bülow's playing would bring him so much, and that his "promise to play" on instruments of a certain make, to the exclusion of all others, could be sold beforehand for so much more. Thus, instead of choosing his piano for himself, which would perhaps have been the more dignified course, Dr von Bülow consented, as Mr Rubinstein had done before him, to accept whatever piano might be assigned to him as the result of the highest bidding for the advantage of his patronage. We are bound to believe that while the struggle for his services was going on Dr Bülow maintained a strict attitude of neutrality. Like the woman who watched her husband fighting with the bear, and placidly declared that she 'did not care which whipped,' he probably reflected that Steinway was about as good as Chickering, and Chickering not a bit worse than Steinway."

The age of Barnum has, evidently, not passed away; and few know better how to follow in the footsteps of that great initiator of the Transatlantic-showman style of puffery than the actual entrepreneur. Of one thing, however, we may be assured—no one could feel a more profound dislike for so questionable a system of advertising his worth than its innocent victim, a genuine, high-souled artist, if there ever was one. It is, indeed, hard upon so eminent a man as Dr Hans von Bülow to be treated as though he were a mere piece of kitchen furniture exposed for sale at a public auction, and knocked down with a hammer.

THAT well-known Non-Juror and clerical outlaw, Jeremy Collier, like "good Queen Anne," is dead; but the spirit which animated him, when he penned his diatribe, entitled: A Short View of the Profaneness and Immorality of the English Stage, is still rampant among us. It is in full swing at Kingston-upon-Thames; and the Reverend A. Williams, Vicar of that pleasant old assize town, has been figuring lately as its exponent and champion.

We are fond of dilating upon the civilization of our age; and we smile with contemptuous pity at the simplicity of our forefathers. Dark-eyed gipsies who cross maid-servants' palms with a piece of silver have to keep a sharp look-out for the police while performing the mystic rite; and snuffy old women who tell fortunes with greasy packs of cards do so at the risk of a visit to the House of Correction. Yet we are not so much improved as we fondly imagine. The lower orders, it is true, are no longer allowed to gratify Credulity with dainty little titbits of superstition, but a good deal of the old way of thinking still lingers among some of the higher, and, what should be, more enlightened classes. The fierce intolerance and narrow-minded bigotry of former days are scotched, not killed. Just as Philip II. of Spain and Mary of England entertained the conviction that they were carrying out the will of Heaven by sending their wretched victims to the block and the stake, many equally sincere and equally misguided individuals of our own day fancy they are acting in a strictly Christian manner, when they make parade of sentiments on a par with those which once rendered the ducking and subsequent cremation of village crones suspected of witchcraft a sport highly popular in these realms. The sport was all the more popular because, being sanctioned by the law, those engaged in it enjoyed as much pleasure and excitement as they could have derived from fox-hunting or poaching, without the chance of bodily harm or legal consequences, a chance always inseparable from the two latter pastimes in the case of those not duly qualified by equestrian skill or social position to patronize them.

But to return to the Rev. Mr A. Williams. That gentleman recently took occasion to fulminate from his pulpit a terrible philippic against certain dramatic performances and "entertainments for the people" to be given in the old town on the banks of the Thames. In so doing he informed his hearers of his belief that he was discharging one of the plainest duties of a pastor—watching for souls for whom he must give account. We entirely disagree with him, and so, it is evident, do the local Magistrates; otherwise they would never have granted the licence for the worldly and ungodly amusements, as he terms them, in hostility to which he so loudly beats his drum ecclesiastic.

Against the granting of this licence, we are informed, he protested, not in his own name only, but in that of "seven or eight brother clergymen of Kingston having cure of souls." Let us hope, for the sake of common sense and the credit of the Established Church, that it was in the name of only seven. The Vicar considered the Magistrates ought to have reflected that at least some regard was due to the representations of parochial ministers, who, to adopt the piece of clerical slang already quoted, and to which he is exceedingly partial, "have cure of souls." Who will assert that the Magistrates did not pay some regard to the parochial ministers having "cure of souls?" The fact of their granting the licence merely shows that they were not benighted enough to pay the representations of the parochial ministers more regard than the representations deserved; that they were, if we may use the expression, not inclined to go the whole animal with the Rev. Mr A. Williams, who wanted them to clothe all Kingston in drab because he and seven or eight brother clergymen—let us again hope the brother clergymen were limited to seven—favoured that sober colour. The Vicar would have had the Magistrates attach greater weight to the gloomy yearnings of a few nineteenth-century Puritans than to the desires of an overwhelming majority of the townspeople, and, because the Magistrates refused to adopt such a course, he is grievously exercised by their backsliding. Oh! Good Mr Williams! Worthy Mr Williams! Dost thou think that, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale? no more theatrical performances? and no more "popular entertainments?" Yes, by St Anne, and all the other Saints, male and female, in the Roman Catholic and Ritualistic Calendars, and ginger shall be hot in the mouth, too; and Kingston-upon-Thames, if it has a leaning that way, shall be gay with love-locks and brave apparel, eschewing sombre vestments and steeple-shaped hats.

After having had his pious fling at the Magistrates, the Preacher went on to furnish still further proofs of his narrow-mindedness in the reasons he assigned for the opposition offered to the theatrical performances and popular entertainments by himself and his seven or eight—we still trust they are only seven—brother clergyman "having cure of souls."

Digitized by Google

Our limited space will not allow us to give these reasons at full length, and we feel sure our readers would not thank us if we did. They were principally distinguished by obliquity of logical vision and gratuitous accusation unsupported by proof. One chief feature, moreover, was the frequent introduction of Scripture texts, and the mode in which the Preacher interpreted them to suit his own purpose. Like a great many other clergymen, the Rev. A. Williams appears to regard a text as something very peculiar; as something entirely independent of the source whence it is drawn; as a number of words to which any possible meaning may be attached; a peg on which any hat, be it chimney-pot, gibus, wide-awake, or sou'wester, may be hung. Indeed, when speaking of texts, we might almost say in the phraseology of the cookery book: Flavour according to taste. What, for instance, has the text, "There is death in the cup," to do with theatrical performances? Why should it be more applicable to theatrical performances than to anything else? Might it not with equal felicity be employed in reference to railway travelling; or the manufacture of gunpowder; or ballooning; or yaching—at certain times, more especially—in the Solent?

The Preacher asserted that, if the Apostle's rule were to be observed—that we are to speak "that which is good to the use of edifying"—the levity, laughing, and trifling, which plays and such-like amusements are calculated to excite must, to say the least, be highly improper and ensnaring in "a so-called Christian community." To this, having first denied that plays are calculated to excite levity and trifling, we reply with Hamlet, of whom the reverend speaker has, perhaps, heard: "Nay, that follows not." If the Kingston Vicar knew more of what he was attacking, he might be less sweeping in his denunciations; he might allow that some plays are not altogether bad; and that some dramatists, say Shakspere, now and then wrote things nearly as sublime and beautiful as his own sermons. We are not quite clear, by the way, as to what the Rev. Mr Williams means by the expression: "a so-called Christian community." Does he imply that Kingston is not a Christian community, but is merely so called? If such is the case, it speaks volumes either for the depravity of Kingston or the incompetency of the Vicar and his brother clergymen.

The Scripture, urges the Rev. A. Williams, pointedly condemns "foolish talking and jesting." Why does not he himself profit by his knowledge of the fact? We do not pretend that his sermon was a joke; far from it; but we do maintain that, if he observed the precept about foolish talking, we should be spared such exhibitions of prejudice and intolerance as that to which he has treated us.

Just as dodos, megatheriums, and other interesting relics of a bye-gone age, are not suffered by delighted antiquarians and naturalists to remain where they were discovered, but are carefully deposited in a museum, the Rev. A. Williams should not be allowed to stop at Kingston-upon-Thames. Kingston-upon-Thames is not the place for him. He should be transported to where he might form one in a collection of other curiosities like himself. We could mention a Cathedral town which would be exactly the locality for him. He might then vary his attacks upon dramatic performances and "popular entertainments" by joining in a crusade against Oratorios.

We have received papers and letters from New York, which give very favourable accounts of the Tietjens Concerts, in Steinway Hall, with Arabella Goddard as pianist. We shall refer to them in our next number.

Dialogues in Purgatory.

Dr Serpent. What was your opinion of the native airs in the Aïda selection?

Dr Ghost. My opinion was that Verdi had been spoiling the Egyptians.

Dr Serpent. What was your opinion as to the rest of the music?

Dr Ghost. My opinion was that the Egyptians had spoilt Verdi.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Miss Minnie Hauck has, after much travelling, returned to Berlin, where she is more than ever a favourite with the public. Who can wonder? Barbarous, indeed, would be the country which declined to "present arms" (open arms) to Minnie Hauck.

It was on the 7th of this month, in the year 1835, that Rossini's first wife, Isabelle Angèle Colbran, died at Bologna.

Dr Hans von Bülow should by this time have arrived at Boston. It is to be hoped the renowned pianist may receive such a welcome in the United states as is due to his exceptional genius. Chickering Hall should be re-christened Bülow Hall.

It is rumoured that Mr Mapleson, of Her Majesty's Opera is is in treaty with Richard Wagner for a model of the model theatre at Bayreuth. Mr Mapleson is also of a mind (rumour again) to have orchestra and conductor under the stage—in hearing but out of sight.

We hear that Professor G. A. Macfarren has a third pianoforte sonata completed. Why is it not published? Amateurs and musicians have not forgotten the sonatas in E flat and A, which Mr W. H. Holmes, Sterndale Bennett's first instructor at the Royal Academy of Music, used to play so finely.—Graphic.

An actor at Pekin recently killed his manager, because the latter would not allow him to introduce into his part a tirade against Europeans. Amiable actor! We have not heard that he has been rewarded by the Chinese Government for his patriotic and meritorious act, but we should not be surprised if he had.

Dr Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, is reported to be engaged on a biography of Mendelssohn. We fear the news is too good to be true; yet, now that Carl Klingemann is gone, nobody could undertake the task with fuller sympathy, or with amplèr materials at disposal, than Hiller, one of the earliest and most intimate friends of Mendelssohn, and only three years his junior.

The first Handel Festival took place in Westminster Abbey, May, 1784. Lady Salisbury arrived very late. The King (George the Third), Queen Charlotte, and all the Royal Family were in their places, and the performance had begun. In the midst of a piece of music a loud hammering was heard, which disturbed and offended the audience, who expressed their displeasure promptly and vehemently, but in vain. On went the hammering without intermission. The music ceased, the assembly rose in an uproar, and their Majesties despatched Lord Salisbury—at that time Lord Chamberlain—to ascertain the cause of so indecent a disturbance. It proved to be his wife. On entering the box reserved for the Lord Chamberlain and his family, her ladyship found it had been divided to accommodate another party, and had insisted on carpenters being sent for, and compelled to pull down the partition, in utter disregard of King, Queen, Lords, Commons, singers, fiddlers, and the British public!

THE threatened visit of Ole Bull (the "Brumagem-Paganini") next season, reminds us of a very memorable performance of the "Kreutzer," in which Franz Liszt was pianist and Bull violinist. Franz completely drowned Ole, and no more was heard of poor Bull. This was in the month of May.

THE symphony at this concert (Crystal Palace, Oct. 9)—which began pompously with Mendelssohn's "Trumpet Overture" (so-called)—was one of Haydn's, in E flat, not belonging to the "Salomon" set, and, indeed, unknown to the majority of amateurs. It is fine, no doubt—or it would not be Haydn's; nevertheless, it bears so strong a family resemblance to some half-dozen others from his exhaustless pen, that almost every bar of it sounds more or less familiar.

The month of October reminds us of the births of Giuseppe Verdi (1813), Adolfo Fumigalli (1828), Franz Liszt (1809), and Federico Ricci (1809). In the same month died Antonio Sacchini (1786), Adrien Boïeldieu (1834), Frederic F. Chopin (1849), Georg Nepomuceno Hummel (1837), Etienne Henri Méhul (1817), Michael Balfe (1870), Ludwig Spohr (1859), Alessandro Scarlatti (1725), Francesco Morlacchi (1841), P. Raimondi (1853), and Jean François Lesueur (1837).

WE learn from the Ménestrel that M. Arthur Pougin, one of the ablest and best-informed writers on music in France, is preparing a supplement to the Biographie Universelle des Musiciens of the late M. Fétis, with a view to filling up certain gaps in that colossal but very incomplete, and often inexact, compendiary. Among other topics insufficiently treated by M. Fétis is that relating to British musicians, which M. Pougin is laudably anxious to remedy. He should first, however, begin by correcting the errors which M. Fétis, knowing little or nothing about the progress of music in this country, or of the lives and works of those who have mainly contributed to it, has helped to promulgate.

A RUMOUR is abroad that Hereford and Gloucester are discussing the advisability of making common cause with Worcester, in the new disposition of the Three Choir Festivals. Gloucester would not astonish us; but Hereford would. Of course, when we mention the three cities we refer simply to the capitular bodies who have the direction of all that concerns the cathedrals. Meanwhile festivals on the largest scales have sprung up at Bristol, Liverpool, Leeds, and Glasgow; so that, what with these, and the important triennial fêtes at Birmingham, the comparatively insignificant meetings of the Choirs will hardly be missed. At the same time, the chance of again hearing oratorios in a church, not in strips and fragments, but complete, must be indefinitely postponed; and this fact alone is to be regretted. In the capital, however, there is no cause for despair, while St Paul's and Westminster Abbey throw open their gates on special occasions to John Sebastian Bach and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy—to the Passions-Musik and St Paul. In other places, too, the example is winning ground—as, for instance, St Anne's, Soho. Very many will take to heart the eloquent protest with which Lady Foley accompanied her donation to the charity for the widows and orphans, after the so-called "Festival" held last month at Worcester. They were in the spirit of a right-minded woman, and a fervent Christian.

SPEAKING of the production of Oberon, Mr Planché says:—

"The fortunes of the season were staked upon the success of the piece. Had I constructed it in the form which would have been most agreeable to me and acceptable to Weber, it could not have been performed by the company at Covent Garden, and if attempted must have proved a complete fiasco. None of our actors could sing, and but one singer could act—Madame Vestris—who made a charming Fatima. A young lady who subsequently became one of the most popular actresses in my recollection was certainly included in the cast; but she had not a line to speak, and was pressed into the service in consequence of the paucity of vocalists, as she had a sweet though not very powerful voice, and was even then artist enough to be entrusted with anything. That young lady was Miss Goward, now Mrs Keeley, and to her was assigned the exquisite Mermaid Song in the finale to the second act. At the first general rehearsal, with full band, scenery, &c., the effect was not satisfactory, and Fawcett, in his usual brusque manner, exclaimed, 'That must come out!—it won't go!' Weber, who was standing in the pit, leaning on the back of the orchestra, so feeble that he could scarcely stand without such support, shouted, 'Wherefore shall it not go?' and leaping over the partition like a boy, snatched the baton from the conductor, and saved from excision one of the most delicious morceaux in the opera. No vocalist could be found equal to the part of Sherasmin. It was, therefore, acted by Fawcett, and a bass singer, named Isaacs, was lugged in head and shoulders to eke out the charming quatuor, 'Over the dark blue waters.' Braham, the greatest English tenor perhaps ever known, was about the worst actor ever seen, and the most unromantic person in appearance that can well be imagined. His deserved popularity as a vocalist induced the audience to overlook his deficiencies in other qualifications, but they were not the less fatal to the dramatic effect of the character of Huon de Bordeaux, the dauntless paladin who had undertaken to pull a hair out of the Caliph's beard, slay the man who sat on his right hand, and kiss his daughter! Miss Paton, with a grand soprano voice, and sufficiently prepossessing person, was equally destitute of histrionic ability, and, consequently, of the four principal parts in the opera only one was adequately represented, that of Fatima by Madame Vestris. Amongst the minor characters, Miss Harriet Cawse, a pupil of Sir George Smart's, distinguished herself as an arch and melodious Puck, and did her 'spiriting gently,' and Mr Charles Bland, brother of James, the future king of extravaganza, was happily gifted with a voice which enabled him to execute, at least respectably, the airs assigned to the King of the Fairies. The composer therefore had justice fairly done to him."

PROVINCIAL.

LEICESTER.—Mr Elliot Galer has again opened his pretty theatre, with every sign of success. Mr Galer commenced his season by producing Money, followed by high-class comedies of an earlier date; and, with an efficient company, were highly successful. Mr Galer has now brought out a sensational drama from his own prolific pen, the title of which is Cast on the World. It attracts crowded houses nightly. The play reflects great credit upon the author and manager. It is admirably mounted, and most carefully acted throughout by an excellent "working company." We sincerely wish Mr Galer the success he deserves for raising a high standard of taste for the drama and opera in Leicester, which must improve the moral and social condition of the industrious population of one of the most thriving towns in England.—R. C.

STOKE-ON-TRENT.—Mr J. H. L. Glover, organist of St Mark's, Shelton, gave an evening concert here on Thursday. A vocal quartet of his, "Bonny May," elicited strong marks of approval. As conductor and accompanist too, Mr Glover showed equal ability. The vocalists were Mrs J. H. L. Glover, who sang, "Within a mile of Edinboro'," and joined Mr Lowder in Mendelssohn's "I would that my love" and "The Happy Hunters;" Miss Thorley sang Randegger's "Peacefully Slumber" (encored); Miss Dunville gave Roeckel's "Little May;" Mr Dunville and Mr Lovatt, from Manchester Cathedral, also joined in the vocal selection. Mr Horton C. Allison, still the only English First Prizeman of the Leipsic Conservatoire, played, in brilliant style, Liszt's Fantasia on the "Wedding March" and the Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and, in the second part, some compositions of his own, with Chopin's "Valse" in A flat.—(From a Correspondent.)

ANNE BOLEYN.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—As I see from the bills that the subject of a new play, about to be produced at morning performances on the 16th, 23rd, and 30th of October, is the story of Anne Boleyn, I ask the favour of your columns for the statement that I have had in hand for some months a long-contemplated play in five acts on the same subject, to be produced at the Haymarket this Christmas. I wish it to be known that my choice of the subject was not suggested by the announcement of the play entitled A Crown for Love of which I know nothing, and to which I wish all success. The action of my play has been long settled, the dialogue is in part written, and the scenery is in preparation.—I am Sir, your obedient servant,

Garrick Club, Oct, 14th. TOM TAYLOR.

MAD. CHRISTINE NILSSON, on her way to Plymouth, was stopped for three hours at Yelverton, in consequence of the floods. Happily, she did not even catch cold, after three hours' walking about at a station where there was not a village, not even a tavern, within two or three miles. She was accompanied by her husband, M. Rouzaud, and her agent, Mr H. Jarrett.

CONCERT.

Mrs John Macfarren gave a pianoforte and vocal recital last Monday, to an audience of nearly one thousand persons, in the extensive hall connected with the Bow Station of the North London Railway. The accomplished pianist played an attractive selection of pieces by the best composers, creating in each and all a powerful impression. In her hands, the "Funeral March," which forms a prominent feature of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, made an effect that was solemn and pathetic in the highest degree, and the sparkling rondo of the same sonata teemed with life and freshness, like a spring morning. The vocal portion of the programme was entrusted to Miss Mary Davies and Miss Lizzie Evans, who sang charmingly Mendelssohn's two-part song, "Maybells," Mr Henry Smart's duettino, "May," and Professor Macfarren's duet from She Stoops to Conquer, "Sweet Summer morn" (encored); Miss Mary Davies gave the love song of Cherubino, in Le Nozze di Figaro, with expression; and Miss Lizzie Evans was heard to great advantage in Macfarren's "When I remember," the second verse of which she repeated, in obedience to a unanimous demand. Mrs John Macfarren was warmly applauded throughout the evening, notably so after Brissac's fantasia, "Bonnie Scotland."

BRIGHTON.

(Abridged from the "Brighton Examiner.")

Mr Kuhe's third subscription concert took place last evening at the Pavilion Dome. The room was crowded with a brilliant audience. The principal attraction was Madame Christine Nilsson; Mdlle Johanna Levier, Miss Alice Fairman, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Caravoglia (vocalists), Mr F. H. Cowen (conductor), and Mr Kuhe (pianist), also taking part in the performances—a company which could not fail to be appreciated by a Brighton audience. The concert opened with the trio, "Vieni al mar," sung by Mdlle Levier, Miss Fairman, and Mr Lloyd. This was followed by Louisa Gray's "She and I," (Signor Caravoglia). Schubert's "Wohin" was sung by Mdlle Levier, who was greeted with a hearty and unanimous recall. Mr Edward Lloyd was highly successful in the "Rose Song," from Balfe's Il Talismano, which we have never heard him sing better.

The prima donna of the evening, Madame Christine Nilsson, whose appearance had been awaited with breathless interest, was greeted with a storm of applause, such as is accorded only to artists of the highest eminence and popularity. She sang "Tacea la notte" in the most finished and exquisite manner, and was rewarded at the close with an enthusiastic encore, to which she responded by singing a quaint French song. Mdme Nilsson also gave "Parigi o cara," with Mr Lloyd, in charming style—thus, with complete success and a hearty recall, bringing the first part of the concert to a conclusion. In the second part Mdlle Nilsson gave "Angels ever bright and fair" with such pathos and sweetness that it was re-demanded and repeated. Her last piece was Sullivan's "Let me dream again," in which, obtaining another hearty encore, she responded with one of her genial and charming Swedish melodies.

A duet by Kücken (Mdlle Levier, and Miss Fairman), Brahms's "Wiegenlied," (Mdlle Levier—encored); "My Mother's Song" and Cowen's "Never again" (Miss Fairman), Sullivan's "Sweethearts" (Mr Edward Lloyd—encored); Rossini's "La danza" (Signor Caravoglia—also encored), Costa's "Ecco quel fiero" (Mdlle Levier, Miss Fairman, Mr Lloyd, and Signor Caravoglia), and "Turn on, old Time," were the other vocal pieces. In Thalberg's Tarantelle Mr Kuhe was rewarded with loud applause, and in a second solo elicited an encore, when he substituted Gottschalk's "Pasquinade," arranged by himself. Mr F. H. Cowen was a competent conductor. The general arrangements, in the hands of Messrs Potts and Co., were most satisfactory.

Bologna.—A new opera, Mefistofele, has been produced here. It is in four acts, with a prologue and an epilogue. Both the libretto—founded upon Goethe's Faust—and the music are from the pen of Sig. Arrigo Boito, who was called on, the first night, twenty-one times. The principal characters, Margherita, Faust, and Mefistofele, were sustained respectively by Signora Borghi-Mamo, Signori Campanini and Nannetti.

A CHAPTER IN THE RITUAL OF THE PAST.

(To the Editor of the "Folkestone Free Press.")

Sir.—I have admired the coolness with which Catholic Revivalists have propounded, and the innocence with which its adherents have accepted, the principle that Ritual and Reverence have always exhibited a direct proportion to each other. I should suppose, to begin with, that the Ordinance of God—if it be already proved to be His Ordinance—requires no apology whatever. The Church executes her Lord's command; the world has nothing to do with it. But there is not the faintest indication of Ritual in the lex scripta of the New Testament. Ritual is wholly derived from the lex non scripta of Tradition, to which the Church of England is in no wise bound. Therefore our Revivalists are fain to back their innovations by Apology, in absence of Authority. But the present apology is worse than useless; it is positively detrimental. I will explain.

In a treatise well known to musicians, "La Musique, mise à la portée de tout le monde." (Mons. Fetis. Paris, 1829), we have an account of a scandalous transaction which I will paraphrase in English. "The Festival of Fools" (fête des fous), established in France in the 10th century, was held in every town, and was long extant at Aix and Dijon. The extravagances which took place in the churches on this festival are scarcely credible. To be believed, one should read the particulars together with the proofs in Duncange's Glossary. A Bishop or Archbishop of Fools was elected in the cathedral churches with much absurd buffooning by way of ordination. He carried the mitre, crucifix, and even the archiepiscopal crozier. In churches under direct Roman obedience there was elected a Pope of Fools (papa fatuorum), to whom were derisively given the papal insignia, that he might officiate solemnly as the Holy Father. The priests performed mass on this occasion in masquerade. They danced, and sang obscene songs on entering the choir. The deacon and subdeacon ate at the altar, and played at cards and dice on it. The choristers burnt pieces of old leather instead of orthodox incense. After "mass" everybody danced and scampered about the church and gave way to every sort of absurdity. "Les religieuses étaient libres ce jourla de mêler aux prêtres et la license aussi loic que possible." . . . . . A donkey was brought into church; he was vested in a cope, and had the following canticle addressed to him,

"Orientis partibus,
Adventavit asinus
Pulcher et fortissimus
Sarcinis aptissimus.
(Chorus) Hé, sire âne! hé!"

Father Theophilus Raymond states that he has seen in a metropolitan church a "Prosa of the ass" (prose de l'âne) noted; of which the foregoing is a specimen. The Alleluia, sung after the Deus in adjutorium, was an imitation of an ass's bray (set to certain words which I cannot profane by quoting them in such a connection as this.) "All the office of the "Fête des Fons" noted, was before the Revolution, to be found in a MS. of the church of Sens. After the said Alleluia was to be seen an anthem which was (according to the rubric) to be sung in falsetto by five rough voices. By way of conclusion, the priest instead of saying Ita missa est, brayed three times like a donkey." (Fetis, Sur la Musique d'Eglise, p. 404 et seq.)

These, and such horrible sacrilege were the first, as Tetzel's traffic in indulgences was the final cause of the cataclysm which convulsed Europe, and which obliged Pope Pius IV. to summon the Council of Trent, A.D. 1563, one year later than the Convocation of the Provinces of Canterbury and York, whereat the National Church of England solemnly drew up the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion upon which she now stands, and from which "no varying or departing in the least degree" is to be "indorsed"

Hamburgh.—Herr Robinson has been singing at the Stadttheater as the hero in Marschner's opera of Hans Heiling.

Cologne.—The Tonkünstler-Verein have forwarded 200 marks to the Committee of the Bach Memorial at Eisenach.

Frankfort-on-the-Maine.—Professor Julius Sachs has been created a Knight of the Portuguese Order of Christ.

Dresden.—The exterior of the new Theatre Royal is rapidly approaching completion. Herr Schilling's Panther Quadriga has already been despatched to the foundry, and the sculptures representing the various styles of opera and drama are in a forward state. According to report, Schiller will be duly represented inside the house, and compensation be thus made for the fact that none of the personages from his dramas find a place among the figures outside. Professors Hofmann, Gonne, and Grosse, as well as Herr Marshall, who left Weimar some time since to settle here, are busy on the pictorial part of the work.

The first of the second series of the subscription concerts arranged by Mr Haynes, organist of the Priory Church, Great Malvern, took place in his concert-room before a crowded audience. The artists were Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Messrs W. H. Cummings, Patey, and H. Parker (pianist and conductor). The programme consisted of songs, ballads, quartets, and pianoforte solos. Earl and Countess Beauchamp were present.—Malvern News.

Mr Henry Macmanus, the celebrated painter and Professor of the Royal Irish Academy, has just completed a picture on the subject of Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith." It has, report says, been purchased for 500 guineas by a well-known lover of the fine arts. Mr Macmanus is now engaged on a romantic picture, the subject of which is Mr Wellington Guernsey's romance "Alice, where art thou?" made so popular by the music of the late Mr Ascher.

The death is announced, at Edinburgh, from rapid consumption, of the actress, Lady Don. The deceased, eldest daughter of Mr John Sanders, of the Adelphi Theatre, was known as Miss Emily Eliza Sanders. She married, at St Marylebone Church, October 19, 1857, Sir William Henry Don, seventh Baronet, of Newtondon, county Berwick, formerly officer in the army, afterwards an actor. Sir William Don died at Hobart Town, Tasmania, March 19, 1862, being succeeded in the title by the present Sir John Don-Wauchope. Lady Don has issue one daughter, Harriette Grace Mary.

It seems that Mr George Armstrong, of the Inter-Ocean, is not the person who deserted a wife and five children, and for several reasons we think, says the Chicago Tribune, the denial savors of truth. Firstly, he never was married, which disposes effectually of the wife, and nearly as satisfactorily of the children. Secondly, he never was in England. And, thirdly, never deserted anybody that he knows of. The letter was originally sent to Architect Armstrong, who indorsed on it: "George Armstrong, Inter-Ocean," and thus the article crept into print. That ruptured engagement may therefore be renewed without danger.

From Professor Macfarren's recent address (or proclamation), it is clear that the Royal Academy of Music must sooner or later look for more spacious accommodation than is provided by the venerable house in Tenterden Street. It is not, however, at all likely that our respected institution will allow itself to be swallowed up in the vortex of South Kensington. The new Operahouse (Thames Embankment) proposition is, we believe, abandoned, as unfeasible. The late Principal of the Academy, Sir Sterndale Bennett, would never have tolerated the idea of either amalgamation; nor probably is his successor more favourably disposed.

The Rev. Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, Bart., Sir Julius Benedict, Sir George Elvey, Sir John Goss, Sir R. P. Stewart, Prof. Macfarren, Dr Stainer, Dr Verrinder, Dr Steggall, Dr Wylde, Signor Arditi, Signor Randegger, Signor Schira, Messrs Owain Alaw, John Barnett, F. Berger, William Carter, W. G. Cusins, W. Ganz, J. L. Hatton, E. J. Hopkins, F. B. Jewson, F. Lablache, E. Land, Mallandaine, G. A. Osborne, Joseph Proudman, Brinley Richards, Carl Rosa, Charles Salaman, C. Santley, C. E. Stephens, Tamplini, and others, have accepted Mr Willert Beale's invitation to join the Council of Musicians for the forthcoming series of National Music Meetings.

"The last piece in the programme" (says a weekly contemporary) "was a concert-overture by Mr W. G. Cusins, intended as a musical illustration of Shakspere's Love's Labour's Lost. In his general conception Mr Cusins has adopted the style of 'Pastoral,' and striven to imbue his work with the spirit of English melody. The overture consists of an introduction (moderato), and an allegro vivace—both in E major, the latter being not merely characteristic, but cleverly worked out. The instrumentation exhibits a thorough knowledge of the art of orchestral combination. The performance (under the direction of Mr Manns) was careful and effective, but came too late to be properly appreciated." We need hardly say to whom and to what all this applies.

A part of the exterior of Westminster Abbey is undergoing the process of re-facing. The north porch, near St Margaret's Church, has for some time shown symptoms of decay, and it has been decided to re-face it as far as the large circular window over the recessed arched entrance to the Abbey. The work will include the turrets and towers at the east and west angles of the elevation, the four buttresses on each side the central entrance, and the two buttresses at either angle—all in a decayed state. The principal central recessed arched entrance, the arches on either side, and the recessed windows above, will undergo similar restoration, together with the small Gothic arches above the central arch. The work is to be executed in sections, and, on the east side of the central archway entrance, is in progress. The decayed stonework, to a depth of several inches, is being removed, and new masonry will be filled in.

M. Bonnat has just concluded, at the Palais-de-Justice, the allegorical pictures which will adorn each side of the painting of "Our Saviour on the Cross," exhibited at the Paris Salon in 1874. In a few days this important work will be uncovered.

The Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society's second ballot for the election of Fellows was held on the 18th inst. Seven hundred and fifty-nine ladies and gentlemen came up for election, of whom five hundred and ten were duly elected.

The Malvern News tells us "there was a large attendance of Johnnies and Mollies at Ledbury 'Mop,' when the usual Old-day Michaelmas goose dinners were served at table d'hôte."

"Dear uncle, accept our best thanks,
For your very nice Michaelmas treat;
Such a beautiful bird I ne'er saw—
So tender, so young, and so sweet!
My wife and myself both declare,
Since we tied the hymeneal noose,
We never before clapped our eyes
On so fine, so delicious a goose."

"Geese"—adds Malvern News,—"were abundant, tender and fine, at Mrs Mathews' of the Oak;" so that "friend Morris" must have tackled more or less each particular goose.

COBURG.—Herr Scholz's opera, Golo, has been produced.

KIEL.—The season was inaugurated here with Der Freischütz.

SONDERSHAUSEN.—A Schumann Festival was recently celebrated here.

WEIMAR.—A new opera, Rosamunde, by Herr Metzdorf, is in rehearsal.

BRUSSELS.—The new managers of the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie display a laudable activity, and their bills are characterised by pleasing variety. Robert le Diable has been given, with M. Sylva, a great favourite, in the principal part. M. Echetto was Bertram, and Mdlle Vanden Berghe, Alice. M. Libert, a fresh acquisition, made his first appearance as Raimbaut. Faust has been performed, with a new cast, Mdlle Derivis being Marguerite; M. Warot, Faust; M. Neveu, Mephistophélès; and M. Devoyod, Valentin.—Verdi's Requiem will shortly be performed here, most likely at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. The singers have been selected by the composer himself.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

These Masses are published in a cheap form, in order to meet a growing demand for simple, melodious, harmonized music. In the cases where the register has been found too high for boys' voices, supplementary notes have been inserted.

They are thus adapted as well for Chancel Choirs, as for those in which the Soprano parts are taken by female voices.

Venersborg (Sweden).—Mdlle Victoria Bunsen's concert yesterday (the 26th Sept.), at the new theatre, as expected, attracted all the musical and fashionable people of our town. Her first song, the Donna Caritea, made a remarkable impression, and she had to appear twice on the stage to acknowledge the hearty greeting of the public. Still greater was the enthusiasm created by some Swedish national songs, which Mdlle Bunsen sang with genuine expression. The last had to be repeated, in obedience to a unanimous desire. The last piece was a duo by Dannström, by Mdlle Bunsen alone, who took, alternately, the part of tenor and contralto. This duo was expressly composed for Lady Boye (the composer's wife), and has only been sung by her and Mdlle Victoria Bunsen in the concert-room. It was a complete success. Mdlle Bunsen retired amidst a shower of bouquets. and, several times recalled, gave another song, "C'est l'Espagne," by Offenbach. Mdlle Felicia Bunsen (sister to the accomplished vocalist) won sympathy by her tasteful performance of two piano pieces. We hope we may have the pleasure, next year, of hearing the two sisters again, and that they will not forget Venersborg when on a visit to Sweden.

THE CHIMES OF POTSDAM.

They are not pious only Sunday-go-to-meeting chimes, but they ring out every hour, every half-hour, and every quarter, and even at each eighth burst out with a joyous "Trinkemal." How I gloried and revelled in their music, though they did not say to me, "Ellabe, Ellabe," as Trotty's chimes said to him, "Toby Veck, Toby Veck, keep a good heart, Toby!" But they sang a sweeter, softer, more melodious strain. One time a "Praise the Lord, the the powerful King of Glory" swelled in deep, majestic tones. Then again, a simple warning in "Be ever true and honest unto thy life's end, and never wander from the paths of rectitude" set me to wondering how people could be so thoroughly dishonest as some folk can be, who are not beyond the sound of these chimes, which preach in the most persuasive tones this grand moral sermon. But one unfortunate day I discovered that my chimes, my worshipped, revered, mystical, musical chimes themselves, in defiance of their lofty position and their strictly moral teachings, told a falsehood every hour, yes, a downright palpable lie. I was to be at the station at 10.5. I started early, for I loved to stroll through the grateful shade of the park near the church. A refreshing rain in the night made the morning still more inviting. The birds were singing and the air was heavy with the perfume of a thousand flowers; the chimes burst forth louder and more resonant than ever. For the first time, as the last strains died away in the distance, I counted the hour. The great hammer struck slowly, one, two, three—ten. So late! Impossible! And there was the empty parade-ground by the old castle, the large bridge, and another stretch of ground between me and the station. I looked at my own hitherto neglected timepiece, that said as plain as two hands on the honest face could say, 9.30. But the warning of my faithful friend was disregarded. Worse, it was snubbed and shut up with a snap, for had not the chimes, the royal, aristocratic chimes, said ten, and ten it must be. I gathered my traps and flew over the parade-ground, or at least imitated that movement as well as one could be expected to do in the modern fashion of tightly tied-back drapery, rushed upon the long bridge on the left side of the course, though a sign-board said in great staring letters, "Fussgaenger gehen rechts." I got mixed up in the coming crowd, who jostled and poked me on all sides. I tried to cross over where I belonged, but the droschke coachmen only whipped up their half-starved horses and leered at me. I stepped back and sought to make myself as small as possible. In Berlin a policeman would have long before annihilated me. Suddenly the draw of the bridge slowly opened, and the gathering crowd was brought to a dead halt. While patiently waiting I chanced to turn my eyes to the station clock, and there was the railroad time that said a few minutes beyond half-past nine. I was shocked. Then I grew indignant. Who wouldn't, after running himself into a fever heat and making such a spectacle of himself, all for a wicked falsehood! I hurried back, determined to find out why the chimes had so unshamedly said ten. Flushed and excited, I paused under the historic linden of Frederick the Great to regain my breath. This poor relic of ancient times had its immense body sewed up in a stout linen bagging, its decrepit limbs supported by stout iron props. On its worn trunk, in those troublous times, there was nailed, during the night, a placard, with a disgraceful, libellous insult to the king. In the morning the old hero read it from his chamber window, and sent down word to his servants to have it taken off and nailed lower down, that all the people might better read it. How much this old tree had seen and endured. If it only had a tongue to speak and tell we why, in all these long, long years, the old chimes had always repeated the same untrue tale!

While I was cooling my wrath, and thinking over these strange things, an old man wandered by. He looked as though he had been born and grown up at the same time as the linden and the chimes. He was not so well preserved. No kind hand had wrapped up his body in stout, strong linen, and only a wooden staff supported his feeble, tottering limbs.

I said—"Can you tell me what the chimes play at the hour?"

"I ought to; I have heard it often enough. In common times they play 'Praise the Lord,' but they are so arranged that they can be changed. 'What God does is well done' is substituted. Yes, I have heard the mournful sonnets for our good king Frederick William III., and his son, Frederick William IV., Quee Elizabeth, his wife, and now my time will soon be here."—"Then what do they play at the half-hour?"—"The song 'Be ever true and honest.'"—"No, you must be mistaken, for they played that song a few moments ago, and then struck ten, and it is not yet ten o'clock."—"Of course not. At the half-hour it strikes the future hour to let you know it is coming, and at the hour it sounds it again to let you know it is here."

I think if the old man had been the inventor of this wonderful piece of wisdom, instead of merely the relator, I should have pounced on him, and shaken him to pieces. I burst out: "How on earth is a stranger to know the difference?"

The old man almost changed my wrath into mirth, as he answered as though amazed at my petulance, with a stolid look of self-complacency: "Why, somebody must tell him."

While I was puzzling myself over this local answer, the chimes, as though to cheer and comfort me, broke out in their three-quarter strain of "Trinke mal, trinke mal." I thanked the old man, and pursued my way, consoling myself that in those old-fashioned times the Dutch (for the chimes were cast in Holland) never dreamed of a railroad and its inevitable hurry and bustle, and I ought not to blame the chimes for their share in the deception. So I went back to my old love, and every time I hear them now I strive to puzzle out some clue to the wonderful wisdom of originating the idea of striking the hour a half hour before it arrives.—Cincinnati Gazette.

CHRISTINE NILSSON IN DANGER.

In our last we referred to an accident which happened to the train from London to Plymouth, at the (so-called) Silverton Station. Mr Louis Appledore (a correspondent to the Times, of the 23rd inst.) gives a more detailed account, from which we extract the following:—

"At 10 o'clock on Tuesday night the 5·0 express from London to Plymouth narrowly escaped a Shipton disaster. At Tiverton Junction we stopped, and thence started for Exeter. Whirled along at seventy miles an hour, we passed Hele Station signals clear, when midway to the following station—Silverton—we came on a mass of timber which had floated down the line, and had become stranded across the metals. From the speed at which we were travelling, and the heavy engine of the broad gauge system, we cut through every balk of timber, but the concussion drove us off the metals, and, after ploughing the way for some 100 yards, we came to a standstill. The shock was terrific, and few who heard the shriek of the engine whistle had any doubt but that a disaster was imminent. By the resolute efforts of driver, stoker, and guard, this was averted, but an escape more extraordinary has seldom been recorded."

A still more detailed account appeared in a Plymouth journal (Morning News), at the end of its report of the brilliant concert given by Madame Nilsson on the ensuing night. From this a few sentences must suffice:—

"Few present could have been aware how narrowly they escaped disappointment. Madame Nilsson and her concert party were travelling to Plymouth in the train due soon after midnight. At Slough there had been some delay consequent on the accident to the 'Flying Dutchman;' but before reaching Exeter matters assumed a more serious aspect. The storm line was entered just as the rain was at its highest. The line was deluged, timbers were floating, and the motion of the carriage showed that part of the train was off the line. At the side of the line the water was flowing to the depth of five feet, and the alarm was general. Fortunately at this juncture the roadside station of Silverton was reached. Hastily dismounting, the travellers found their refuge deserted, a boy being the sole representative of the company. Better attendance was procured, but the passengers had for three hours only the rough protection of the station building, free from inundation. Vigorous efforts were made to prepare the train for another start, and at two o'clock p.m.—long after due at Plymouth—the passenger carriages were ready to go on, the luggage van being still in a hopeless fix. The great singer and her companions then resumed their journey, and reached Plymouth at half-past four in the morning."

The danger was imminent from all accounts; but the escape no less consoling. We can't afford to lose "Christine."

HAMBURGH.—Sig. Pollini, the manager of the Stadttheater, has adopted, with success, the system of giving a mixed entertainment, partly operatic and partly dramatic, on the same evening.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The musical season in this city has now begun in earnest, and there is little fear that the most greedy amateur will have cause to complain during the coming winter. Classical chamber music, and grand orchestral performances, oratorios and operas, will all be given. The subscription list for Mr Hallé's concerts was never so full; and Mr Carl Rosa's season at the renovated Theatre Royal, now one of the most comfortable in England, is likely to be more prosperous even than his previous successful campaigns here. I have already noticed the great success of Mr Alfred Cellier's Tower of London at the Prince's Theatre, the manager of which promises a short season of Italian Opera next December, to be supported by members of Mr Gye's company, including Mdlles Albani and Z. Thalberg, MM. Naudin and Maurel. Strange to say, Mdlle Albani has never yet sung in Manchester, and her first visit will be rendered additionally memorable by the production of Lohengrin.

Mr De Jong commenced his season a few weeks since, when Herr Gung'l conducted some of his own dance compositions. The singers were Mdme Nouver, a local prima donna, who, I hear, is announced to sing in some of the forthcoming Sacred Harmonic Concerts and Exeter Hall Concerts. Mdme Nouver's voice is remarkably fine, and her singing of "Let the bright seraphim" was very effective. At this concert, also, the Dublin tenor, Mr Barton McGuckin, once more delighted a Manchester audience by his very beautiful voice and artistic singing.

On Saturday last, at Mr De Jong's second concert, the Prize Solo Singers at the Crystal Palace Music Meetings sang for the first time in Manchester, and the favourable reception they met with must have been very gratifying to them. Herr Hermann Franke, the new leader of Mr De Jong's orchestra, played two movements of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto at this concert.

At the Gentlemen's Concert on Monday evening last, Mr C. Hallé made his first appearance this season, and his splendid playing could not have been more admired had there been surprise mixed with the pleasure. The programme of this concert will speak for itself:—

PART I.

Overture, Scherzo and Finale (Schumann); Air, "The light of other days" (Balfe)—Mr Patey; Song, "The mighty trees bend" (The Young Nun)—(Schubert)—Miss Edith Wynne; Song, "The stars are sleeping" (Cowen)—Mr Cummings; Solo Pianoforte, "Serenade and Rondo Giojoso in D" (Mendelssohn)—Mr Charles Hallé; Arietta, "Lungi dal caro bene" (Sarti)—Mdme Patey; Trio, "Dunque il mio ben," Il Flauto Magico (Mozart)—Miss Edith Wynne, Mr Cummings, and Mr Patey.

PART II.

Overture, "Michael Angelo" (Gade); Air, "Let me dream again" (Sullivan)—Miss Edith Wynne; Song, "When the moon is brightly shining" (Molique)—Mr Cummings; Song, "Thou whom my heart adoreth" (F. Barnby)—Mdme Patey; Solo Pianoforte, "Scherzo and Rondo Grazioso, from Sonata in A flat" (Weber)—Mr Charles Hallé; Song, "Once upon a time" (Roeckel)—Miss Edith Wynne; Quartet, "Mezzanotte," Marta (Flotow)—Miss Edith Wynne, Mdme Patey, Mr Cummings, and Mr Patey; Overture, "The Syren" (Auber).

The first of Mr Hallé's grand Concerts will be given this week on Thursday evening. The programme is very attractive:—

Overture, "Egmont" (Beethoven); Air, "Now shall the harp and lute awake" (Handel)—Mdlle Johanna Levier; Air, "Se il rigor," La Juive (Halévy)—Signor Foli; Song, "Ave Maria," with violin, harmonium, and pianoforte accompaniment (violin obbligato, Herr Straus), (Gounod)—Mdme Christine Nilsson; Song, "The Rose Song," Talismano (Balfe)—Mr E. Lloyd; Trio, "This magic-wove scarf" (Barnett)—Mdme Nilsson, Mr E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli; Symphony (unfinished) in B minor (Schubert); Overture in E flat, from Suite No. 4 (first time), (Lachner); New Song, "Let me dream again" (Sullivan)—Mdme Christine Nilsson; Song, "Dear England" (Diehl)—Signor Foli; Duet, "Greeting" (Mendelssohn)—Mdlle Levier and Miss Alice Fairman; Solo Pianoforte, (a) Nocturne in D flat (Chopin), (b) "Wanderer's Song," (c) Hunting Piece (both first time), (Rheinberger)—Mr Charles Hallé; Air, "Cangio d'aspetto" (Handel) — Miss Alice Fairman; Swedish National Melodies—Mdme Christine Nilsson; Song, "Sweetheart" (Sullivan)—Mr Edward Lloyd; March, Athalie (Mendelssohn).

Among the earlier oratorios promised for these Concerts are Handel's Saul, which has not been heard here for many years, and Mendelssohn's St Paul, for which Mr Sims Reeves is engaged.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

There is no lack of variety at the Royal Operahouse. First we have had L'Africaine, with Mad. von Voggenhuber and Madlle Grossi, Herren Niemann and Betz, in the principal parts. Then there was Belmonte und Constanze, in which Herr Kannberg sang for the last time probably in the theatre under the management of Herr von Hülsen, who, as I stated in my last, will not engage him. Next on the lists stands Jessonda, with Mad. Mallinger, Mdlle Lehmann, Herren Ernst, Betz, Fricke, and Lohengrin with Mad. Voggenhuber, Madlle Brandt, Herren Niemann, Betz, and Krolop. These were followed by Die Zauberflöte; Cesario; Le Domino Noir; Armide; Die lustigen Weiber; and Mignon.

In Die Zauberflöte Miss Minnie Hauck made a decided hit as Pamina. It is a long time since the part has been so well given. After her duet with Papageno, and the air in G minor, she was enthusiastically recalled. Such a mark of approbation is unusual here and, therefore, the more significant. Tamino was entrusted to Herr George Schrötter, from the Stadttheater, Hamburgh. Even with an average Pamina, he would not have appeared to advantage. With such a Pamina as Miss Minnie Hauck he was nowhere. He was completely cast into the shade. The contrast was too much for him.

Herr Johann Strauss's Cagliostro still retains its place in the bills of the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, but not its hold upon the public. The management intend shortly giving Lortzing's Beide Schützen.

The series of quartet evenings given by Herren Joachim, de Ahna, Rappoldi, and Müller, have commenced for the season. Speaking of the first concert the Berlin Echo makes the following remarks:—

"We possess, in these perfect quartet performances, something quite unique, the like of which can, at the present day, be found nowhere else, and with which nothing of the same kind, that we know of, is to be compared. Opposite our Joachim sits de Ahna with the second violin, distinguished for its mild tone so full of soul; next to it is the more vigorous, but, with all its volume, soft, viola in Rappoldi's well-proved hand; while the fourth executant is Herr Müller, the Concertmeister, whose violoncello, with its clear tones, constitutes the solid, sturdy substructure, upon which all the refinements of musical architecture may, in their nicest details, be carried out with complete security. The most interesting piece of the evening was, in our opinion, Cherubini's D minor Quartet, No. 3. What an utterly different stamp was borne by the very first notes in it to that of Father Haydn's cheery D Major Quartet, which preceded. Of the four movements: Allegro commodo; Larghetto sostenuto; Scherzo; and Finale, we give the preference to the Larghetto sostenuto and Scherzo, especially to the latter. This piece displays great cleverness in its composition; it is varied and most beautiful in its tone-colouring; it is flowing and worked out most charmingly; similarly, the Larghetto displays in itself, in addition to a strain of poetic inspiration, all the best qualities of Cherubini's style. The last movement comes out with freshness and spirit, while a sort of intelligent coolness seems to cling to the first. The Quartet in its entirety is a very valuable work, and was received by the audience with the greatest sympathy. Beethoven's E flat Major Quartet followed. This peculiar production forms one of the intermediate stations in the transition to the composer's last creative-period. . . . . Here again, as in what had gone before, the execution might have been taken as a model. But why praise in detail the prompt concerted playing; the nobility of conception; all the delicate gradations of light and shade; or the mild and perfectly transparent sound of the combined instruments! The principal fact is that music, by itself, and as an art existing without any disturbing element, is here cultivated in such a manner that it is impossible to imagine or desire anything better."

The Royal Academy of Arts has been re-organized. Herr Hitzig has been appointed President. Professor Daege has received the Order of the Crown, second class, for his long services in connection with the institution.

A MUSICAL FAMILY.

SIR,—I am the father of six sons, and it is my wish to bring them all up as masters of the divine art of music. With this object I have drawn out a little scheme for the education of my children, of which I shall be glad to think you may approve. My eldest son, Jonathan, I propose making a musician of the future. He must be taught to despise the old forms of music, and trample on the old masters. He must learn that obscurity is the test of genius; and he will, I hope, in time, produce works which may take at least two generations to understand. Jonathan must be the epic composer of his period; the successor of Richard Wagner, who, by his side, will sink into harmonious insignificance. I propose sending my eldest son to Dr Wylde's excellent institution in Regent Street, as I am sure no better master could be found than the learned doctor to superintend the education of a youth endowed with original and aggressive ideas.

My second son, Anthony, will be a composer of quite a different stamp. He will belong to the romantic and sentimental school. Love will be his only theme, and Gounod his only model. I have already begun to cultivate his affections with good result. He has been taught to strum a little on the mandoline, which he uses to serenade the under housemaid. He will, I hope, compose an opera that may eclipse Faust, that charming rhapsody so dear to middle-aged lovers. Anthony I propose to place at Dr Macfarren's excellent institution in Tenterden Street.

I shall make my third son, Josiah, a composer of sacred music. When his education is complete, I propose to send him to Palestine, where he may visit the Holy places accompanied by a serious companion, Professor Cook. He will ascend Mounts Sinai and Ararat; he will sail on the river Jordan and the Red Sea; and, when tired, the professor will fill his ears with the devotional melodies of Handel, arranged by Gounod for a pocket harmonium. After Josiah has spent two years wandering about the Holy Land, he will be taken to Jerusalem, in order to compose his first oratorio, The Fall of Man. Josiah promises well, and is already looking forward to his travels. He wishes to commence them to-morrow, by going to the Conservatoire of Paris, to be instructed in fugues and chorals. Having now three composers in the family, I propose making my fourth and fifth sons "virtuosi" of an advanced kind. Timothy will be a violinist. He will be taught to play both in the severe and classic style of Joachim, and the more brilliant and fantastic manner of the late Paganini. He will, consequently, become the greatest living violinist; and, as his reputation must necessarily excite a good deal of jealousy in the profession, I shall have him educated in an out-of-the-way corner of Italy, and brought back in secret to London, where he can burst upon the town like a volcano. Timothy already fiddles a little. He plays the "Sailor's Hornpipe;" and I grieve to say that Josiah was found dancing to that tune the other day. Alexander, my fifth son, less gifted than his brothers, must perforce be a pianist. He does not like the idea himself, and wishes to be a circus-rider. But I am firm. All my children shall excel in music, and Alexander shall be a great pianist. I know it is an easy thing to accomplish, and it must be done. Alexander shall play on two pianofortes at once; he shall play standing, blindfold, or in any other eccentric manner an eclectic public taste may demand. So much for Alexander. He will be trained at the Leipsic Conservatoire, the best institution for young and robust "virtuosi."

My sixth and youngest son, Roger—cleverest of the family—will naturally be a publisher. But he must be a musician as well, or how otherwise can he appreciate his brothers' music? He will publish their compositions—which means a fortune alone. He will also publish their portraits and biographies, for which (although now but seven years old) he is already collecting materials. This is my humble scheme for the training of a truly musical family.—Your obedient servant, JONATHAN BODGERS.

PRAGUE.—Anton Rubinstein's opera, Die Maccabäer, has been roduced here with success.

ACORNS, SLOES, AND BLACKBERRIES.

By GIBBS GIBB GIBBS, ESQ.

No. 18.

RINALDO DEL MEL, a Flemish contrapuntist, flourished in 1538. He is said by Hawkins to have been master of Palestrina.

CHRISTOPHER MORALES was a native of Seville, and the earliest Spanish musician of any eminence whose name we have been able to meet with. He held the situation of a singer in the Pontifical Chapel, under Paul III., about the year 1544, and was the author of two collections of Masses, and of a well-known Magnificat. He also composed a fine motet, Lamentabatur Jacob, which for many years continued to be sung in the Pope's chapel on the fourth Sunday in Lent. Morales likewise composed the Lamentations of Jeremiah, for four, five, and six voices, and a Gloria Patri, composed by him, is preserved in Kircher's Musurgio. As a specimen of his compositions, one of the madrigals Ditti mi o si, taken from his fourth book, published at Venice in 1541, is inserted in Smith's Musica Antiqua. The style of Morales, though learned for the time in which he wrote, is somewhat dry, uncouth, and insipid.

JOHANN NEUSCHL, or Neyschel, court-musician to the Emperor Maximilian II., was a celebrated performer on the trumpet, so much so that the Emperor ordered Albert Durer, the painter, to introduce his portrait in the picture that he painted, of a triumphal entry of the Emperor.

OLYMPUS.—There were two great musicians in antiquity of this name, and both celebrated performers on the flute. One of them flourished before the Trojan war, and the other was contemporary with Midas, who died six hundred and ninety-seven years B.C. The first was a scholar of Marsyas, and a Mysian; the second, according to Suidas, was a Phrygian, and author of several poems, which were by some attributed to the first Olympus. But the most important addition which the disciple of Marsyas made to the musical knowledge of the time was the invention of the Enharmonic genus. Plato and Aristotle, as well as Plutarch, celebrate his musical, as well as his poetical, talents, and tell us that some of his airs were still subsisting in their time. The airs of Olympus used in the temple of worship during the time of Plutarch were not more ancient than the chants or canto fermo to some of the hymns of the Romish church; and the melodies now sung to many of the hymns and psalms of the Lutherans and Calvinists are such as were applied to them at the time of the Reformation. Plato says the music of Olympus was, in a particular manner, adapted to affect and animate the hearers; Aristotle, that it swelled the soul with enthusiasm; and Plutarch, that it surpassed, in simplicity and effect, every other music then known. According to Plutarch, Olympus was the author of the curule song, which caused Alexander to sieze his arms when it was performed to him by Antigenidas. To his musical abilities he joined those of poetry; and, according to Suidas and Jul. Pollux, he composed elegies and other plaintive songs, which were sung to the sound of the flute, and the melodies of these poems were so much celebrated in antiquity for their pathetic and plaintive cast, th t Aristophanes, in one of his comedies called The Knights, where Demosthenes and Nicias are complaining, makes them say, "Let us weep and wail like two flutes breathing some air of Olympus." Plutarch ascribes to him several nomes or airs that are frequently mentioned by ancient writers; such as the Minerva, the Harmatian, Curule or Chariot air, and the Spondean or Libation air.

BRUSSELS.

(From a Correspondent.)

Influenza has been playing terrible havoc with the plans of the co-managers of the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie. Most of the principal artists have fallen victims to it. First, M. Sylva was attacked; then M. Warot; and then—nearly every one else. It was a wonder how the Theatre could be kept open. In this state of things, Le Barbier de Séville, La Sonnambule, and Les Noces de Jeannette have had to do duty for Les Huguenots and Robert le Diable, which would otherwise have figured in the bills.—Mad. Pauline Lucca is announced to appear, on the 3rd November, in L'Africaine. This will be followed by Les Huguenots and Faust.—Dinorah is in active preparation; so is Le Prophète; and so will be, ere long, Le Philtre, which has not been performed for many years.—A Requiem Mass, by M. Alfred Tilman, was performed in the Church at Lacken, on the 11th October, the 25th anniversary of the death of the late Queen of the Belgians. The Royal Family were present.

DR VON BÜLOW AND HIS PIANOFORTE.

(To the Editor of "Concordia.")

SIR,—Allow me to contradict, categorically, the statement which appeared in your impression of the 16th inst., viz.—that, in order to secure the exclusive privilege of having their instruments used by Hans von Bülow, at the concerts to be given in America, the New York pianoforte makers, Messrs Weber, have offered $10,000; Steinway, $12,000; and Chickering and Sons, $20,000 dollars, to the manager of these concerts, and that the highest bidder has obtained the preference.

No such offer has been made by either of these firms.

The Brunswick member of the Steinway firm, in a special letter to Dr Bülow, made him an indefinite pecuniary proposal of the kind, but it was indignantly refused by him.

I have had business connections with the Chickerings for more than thirty years; they have gratuitously furnished—as is customary in every country—the pianofortes for the American concerts of Thalberg, Henri Herz, and Alfred Jaell, of which I was the manager; but, beyond that, neither they nor I have ever received any subsidy in the shape of money or presents; whereas the Steinways have paid some $15,000 to Leopold de Meyer, and $20,000 to the manager of the Rubinstein concerts. Being, besides, the owners of the only concert room in New York, they rigidly exclude the use of any other pianoforte, European or American, but their own. The Steinways have, therefore, been the first to introduce a system in America which the French would condemn as a concurrence déloyale.

I certainly cannot be blamed that, with every inclination I had to give the preference to the Chickerings, as old friends of mine, I hinted at some such subsidy being given to me on account of the Bülow concerts. This they refused, but proposed to me instead to build a splendid new concert hall, to be inaugurated by Dr von Bülow, and guaranteeing me a certain amount of profits.

By this arrangement—which I accepted, with the proviso that their pianofortes should be approved by the Doctor, in accordance with the right he stipulated in his contract with me—they will, from present appearances, instead of having to pay a large sum, as did the Steinways, be, on the other hand, gainers to a considerable amount.

In consequence of this arrangement, the Messrs Chickering sent a piano to Ventnor, where Dr Bülow was spending the summer, who, after having played upon it for two months, authorised me to select those instruments for his concerts in America, writing me:—"I shall not be able to make so much noise on a Chickering as on a Steinway, but the tone is far more noble and distinguished, like those of Erard's."

This is the true statement of facts as they have occurred. New York owes, therefore, to Dr von Bülow's arrival a new and splendid concert room; and, as it is not the intention of the Chickerings to exclude any other pianofortes from their hall, a monoply, entirely unprecedented in the civilised world has been done away.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Paris, Oct. 18th, 1875. B. ULLMAN.

MUSICAL MUTUAL PROTECTIVE UNION.

BY-LAWS.

ARTICLE IV.—RIGHTS AND BENEFITS OF MEMBERS.

SECT. 1. When member dies, having been member in good standing for one year, counting period from first admission or date of last re-instatement, his next of kin shall receive fifty dollars from general fund of Union.

SECT. 2. In case of application for relief from any member, Board of Directors shall donate such sum as they, in discretion, see fit.

ARTICLE V.—ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

SECT. 1. Election held annually in New York, on second Thursday in September, shall be first advertised by Secretary in two daily newspapers, printed and circulated in New York, at least three weeks previous thereto, once each week; terms of officers to commence on second Thursday in December ensuing, and continue for one year thereafter, until others are elected.

SECT. 2. All candidates for office, voted for by ballot or otherwise, receive a plurality of votes entitling them to election.

SECT. 3. In case of death, resignation, misconduct, neglect, or refusal to act, of said officers, members of this Union shall, at regular quarterly meeting, elect others to fill vacancies.

ARTICLE VI.—FUNDS.

SECT. 1. All funds as received, prior to permanent investment, from dues, fines, admission fees, donations bequests, profits of Concerts or Picnics, or whatever source, shall be deposited by Trustees in one or more Savings Banks in name of Musical Mutual Protective Union designated by Board of Directors, and only drawn by cheque of three Trustees, countersigned by President and Secretary, and seal of Union stamped.

ARTICLE VII.—FUND.

SECT. 1. No donation or appropriation from Fund granted by Union, unless recommended by majority of Board; nor can Directors grant or appropriate money without approval of Union, unless specified.

ARTICLE VIII.—MEETINGS.

SECT. 1. Regular meetings held quarterly at rooms of Union, on second Thursday, March, second Thursday, June, second Thursday, September, and second Thursday, December, at 2 o'clock P.M. Meetings opened and roll of officers called within fifteen minutes after appointed time, and, in absence of both President and Vice-President, Secretary shall call meeting to order, and members elect other officers to preside.

SECT. 2. At annual meeting, on 2nd Thursday, in December, officers of current year shall enter upon their duties.

SECT 3. Three months previous to annual meeting election of officers to take place and Audit Committee appointed.

SECT. 4. Fifteen members may demand special meeting by written notice, stating object of such meeting to President, who, if necessary for interests of Union, shall direct Secretary to convene meeting in usual way.

SECT. 5. In case President refuse to convene special meeting, he shall give objection in writing to signers within three days after receipt of communication. Members may then send call, with objection of President, to Board of Directors, with power to sustain President, or direct Secretary to call meeting.

SECT. 6. At regular or special meeting, thirty-five members shall constitute quorum, to transact business.

[Abridged of particles by DUFF SHORT.]

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—On the 18th, Ignatius Lachner celebrated his fiftieth anniversary as conductor, and then retired from active connection with the stage. The management gave him a benefit on the occasion, the opera selected being Mozart's Figaro.

PESTH.—The erection of the long-projected new Operahouse has at last really been begun. The few first sods of the excavations necessary for the foundations were turned by Baron Friedrich Podmaniczky, Intendant of the National Theatre; Herr Nik, Ybl, Architect; Herr Ludwig Hofhauser, Clerk of Works, and others.

DR VON BÜLOW AND THE AUCTION.

THE subjoined letter has been addressed to the Editor of the Musical World, by Herr B. Ullman, promoter of Dr Hans von Bülow's enterprise, and confidential manager of his affairs in the United States:—

"DEAR MR ——,—I suppose you have read my letter in the Concordia, and you know now that it was a hoax. But how could you believe me capable of lending myself to such a disgraceful proceeding? The contract with Chickering had been signed in May last. It took effect in August, after he had tried 'Chickering's.' He knew the  pianos several years ago; found them to be powerful, but 'coarse,' and the mechanism fatiguing. So does Essipoff, to whom the  sent a piano to St Petersburgh last winter. The 'hoax' originated in a letter 'de fantaisie' from New York to a Chicago paper, giving full particulars of the imaginary auction, at which I presided.*

"Bülow took great care to secure entire independence in all artistical matters, viz., the exclusive right of making his own programme, the right to select the conductor, the right to strike out from the programme any piece, by another artist, that should not be in keeping with his† (to guard against the introduction of 'nigger ballads,' &c.). I never would have signed that contract with anybody but him, knowing him to be so loyal.

"Will you be kind enough to set him and me right with the readers of the Musical World? and accept mes remerciments anticipés. Yours very truly, "B. ULLMAN.

"Paris, 25th Oct., 1875."

Upon this letter—which, oddly enough, Ullman declares was a hoax—we have no particular observations to make. That—hoax or no hoax—it entirely exonerates Dr von Bülow is quite sufficient for us. Nor—as may be judged from the brief observations which appeared last week in the leading columns of this journal—had we ever the slightest doubt upon the subject. In fact, to no one acquainted with Bülow, either as an artist or as a man, could any such doubt be possible.

Elsewhere will be found a disclaimer, addressed by Herr Ullman to our contemporary, Concordia.

* So that Herr Ullman presided at an "imaginary auction." He confesses that much.

† This would seem to infer that Bülow, who has some 1000 pieces in's head and fingers, really possessed but one—that one being of his own invention!

"IT is a very pretty quarrel as it stands," said Sir Lucius O'Trigger to his friend Bob Acres. The words of the fire-eating Hibernian may, with strict propriety, be applied to the little difficulty which has cropped up between no less a personage than Richard Wagner himself, and Herr Scherbarth, manager of the Stadttheater, Düsseldorf.

Last August, then or thenabouts, Wagner denied that there was any truth in the assertion that he and Herr Niemann had, to use a familiar expression, had any words. He gave the Universe to understand that he and Herr Niemann were as firm friends as ever, and that the latter gentleman would, despite all reports to the contrary, sing the part of Siegmund in the Nibelungen Tetralogical Trilogy, at the National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre, Bayreuth. To prove the correctness of what he said, he proceeded to cast about for a tenor to replace Herr Niemann; and he believes he has found one in the person of Herr Unger.

When Wagner had discovered Herr Unger, he likewise discovered that Herr Unger was not a free agent, being under an engagement with Herr Scherbarth at Düsseldorf. But the Composer of the Future is not a man to be stopt by trifles. He forthwith wrote requesting the Düsseldorf Manager to grant Herr Unger leave of absence until the first of November, in order that the artist might go through an additional course of training as a vocalist. Knowing Wagner, and being aware that he made the request wholly and solely for the sake of art—as exemplified in himself—we should not be surprised if, in return for compliance with his wishes, he magnanimously condescended to allow Herr Scherbarth to pay the tenor's salary during his absence from Düsseldorf. Impressed, presumably, with the honour done him; with the importance of Richard Wagner's art-mission; and with a host of other things too numerous to mention, Herr Scherbarth gave the required consent, nobly and disinterestedly resolving, in consideration of the sublime objects in view, to cripple his artistic resources, and jog on as best he could without the leading member of his company until the date above mentioned. So, Herr Unger, who, we believe, had been considered by competent judges perfectly able to sing in the works of Mozart, Gluck, Meyerbeer, and other representatives of a bye-gone period, entered upon the course of instruction requisite for fitting him to cope with the Music of the Future, and all went on for a time as smoothly as a Dutch canal-boat.

But what was Herr Scherbarth's astonishment on receiving, some little time ago, from Wagner, a certain letter dated the 29th September, 1875! Herr Scherbarth was much startled by this epistle, and we are glad he was. Had he not been startled, the celebrated episode about Charles XII. of Sweden, and the bomb which burst close by him as he was dictating a dispatch to his Secretary, would have been for ever eclipsed, and gone down in value like American greenbacks or Turkish insecurities. In the said letter, Wagner announced that Herr Unger must study another half-year if, in the present state of opera, he would preserve his voice from utter ruination. Some persons might, perhaps, suggest that, to ensure a consummation so devoutly to be wished, the most judicious step on the part of the young artist would be to content himself with the Music of the Past, and not venture on such productions as the Bayreuth Tetralogical Trilogy. This, however, is a matter of opinion.

"Leaving out of consideration"—writes Wagner—"the advantage that may accrue to my own enterprise, I consider it would be a sin against German opera, already in so suffering a state, if I allowed, with my eyes open, talent to perish, when, if properly fostered, it promises what our stage so greatly needs, a really accomplished singer."

Herr Scherbarth was then requested not simply to prolong the leave of absence, but to release Herr Unger from his engagement altogether. To this modest and characteristic demand, Herr Scherbarth, with his eyes, probably, open, and open pretty wide from surprise, made answer that, as a business man, he was not prepared, without more ado, to give up a first tenor, and that he thought he had already done quite sufficient for the sake of Art. But it is not for nothing that Wagner belongs to that amiable class of men who will take an ell when you give them an inch, and who prefer, also, a French ell, because it contains six quarters, while an English ell has only five, and a Flemish ell no more than three. Accordingly, he made response under the date of the 3rd October, 1875, in the involved and dictatorial strain which is by no means unusual with him, and for which we have substituted a more intelligible style in our translation, to the following effect:

"I beg you, therefore, to understand me well; to assent without any frivolous pretext of your Düsseldorf speculation, when I emphatically state the most decided determination that from this time forward Herr Unger studies during half a year uninterruptedly with his singing-master, Professor Hey, at Munich, thereby attaining, as I am convinced by the success of his last studies, to certainty in turning to account his natural artistic aptitude; and this certainly can be imparted to him in no other way."

"'Ο γέγραφα γέγραφα," this high and mighty Correspondent might have added. Yes! the Master has spoken. "Therefore, paucas palabris," as Christopher Sly has it. It seems however, that Herr Scherbarth is not of this mode of thinking; that he is not inclined to put up tamely with the loss of his tenor, and sacrifice to the glory of the National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre of Bayreuth the interests of his own theatre at Düsseldorf, which, every-day establishment as it may be, is still the source of his income, and represents for him ease, comfort, respectability, social position, and most of the things for which men toil and moil. Preposterous though such a course must appear, and decidedly is, when adopted towards one who has done so much to teach us—by his own compositions, compared with those of the old school—what to select and what to avoid, and to rescue us from the Cimmerian darkness in which we previously wandered, Herr Scherbarth, it is whispered, does not feel inclined to bow meekly before the dictatorial proceeding of Richard Wagner. If he did feel so inclined, we cannot help thinking that he would strengthen the proof already furnished by those who follow the Bayreuth banner, that all the flats connected with music are not to be found in music-books.

We conclude as we began:—"It is a very pretty quarrel as it stands." —o— R. K.

CARL ROSA.

This enterprising, music-loving, and legitimately energetic professor is now confidently looked upon as the future regenerator of English opera, which emboldens us, notwithstanding the fact that he is more or less of Teutonic origin, to present our readers with his portrait.

He who wills well does well. Otherwise, cui bono? Moreover, Carl Rosa is an exceptional fiddler, has four strings to his bow, and four bows to each particular string.

THE Alexandra Palace Saturday Concerts begin this afternoon. The proceedings will be fully reported.

ABOUT the splendid performance and brilliant success of Cherubini's magnificent opera, The Water-Carrier (Les deux Journées), on Wednesday night, at the Princess's Theatre, under the direction of Mr Carl Rosa, we shall have something to say in our next issue. Enough for the present that the truly enthusiastic musician and conductor has covered himself with glory.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

WE have reason to believe that Mr Irving's next Shaksperian character is to be Othello.

No little excitement has been caused in literary and artistic circles by an incident which occurred recently. M. Philippe Gille, who writes the Echos de Paris in the Figaro, when alluding to some one's exaggerated gestures called them gestes à la Melingue. Melingue, who died not long ago, was a favourite actor whose gestures certainly were often exaggerated. His son, M. Gaston Melingue, however, took the allusion in bad part, and meeting M. Gille, struck him on the head with a loaded cane. M. Gille's head is hard, or he must have been killed. He is now confined to his bed, and congestion of the brain has been averted by repeated application of ice. M. Melingue was arrested, and said, on being brought before the Commissary of Police, that he would not have his father insulted.

DR ED. HANSLICK, the well known and esteemed Viennese musical critic, has just published in the Neue Freie Presse the following corroboration of an historical fact which deeply interests the whole world of music:—

"The Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris contains, in its numbers of the 5th and 12th ult., a letter signed by M. Bannelier on the Additional Exhibition of Musical Instruments which I arranged in conjunction with Herr Exner, Regierungsrath, in the Vienna Universal Exhibition of 1873. In this notice, which, by its kindly tone, must appeal to the sympathies of every Austrian who peruses it, the author clears up a point which in its time has been much discussed, and is of universal musico-historical interest. The Historical Exhibition, I must state, contained, besides the perfectly authenticated pianos of Haydn, Mozart, Sebastian Bach, etc., a grand by Erard, sent from the Linz Landes-Museum, with the date 1804 and the inscription: 'Forte piano, presented by the City of Paris to the Composer, L. v. Beethoven. Giver: Herr Johann van Beethoven, gentleman, Linz (his Brother).' Painful as it was for me to differ from the authorities of the Linz Museum, who had enriched our Exhibition with numerous valuable relics, I felt compelled openly to express my well justified doubts of the correctness of the inscription (which emanated from Beethoven's Brother). A mark of respect from the City of Paris to Beethoven at a period when very few Parisians even knew of the existence of such a man! In addition to this, there was the well known fact that little reliance could be placed on Johann van Beethoven, who was not always very particular about adhering to the truth! But M. Bannelier adopted the praiseworthy measure of consulting the books of the Erard firm. These prove that: 'On the 18th Thermidor of the Year XI. of the Republic (1803), Sebastian Erard sent a grand (un piano forme clavecin) as a present to M. Ludwig van Beethoven in Vienna.' This clears up the matter and authenticates the Erard piano to have been the property of Beethoven. The city of Paris is now, as it was before, out of the question, but the history of the present, and the meritorious act of Sebastien Erard, the genial principal of the celebrated pianoforte manufactory, in paying a spontaneous tribute of artistic homage to Beethoven, then 33 years old, are clearly demonstrated. The Museum at Linz may now boldly describe this valuable object as: 'A present from Sebastian Erard to Beethoven, in the year 1803.'"

The expression "gentleman," in the English version, stands for the word "Privat" in the German description given of himself by Herr Johann van Beethoven. "Privat" means a "private person" not carrying on any trade or profession, and may be regarded as the equivalent of the French phrase: "un particulier," or the Greek "Ἰδιώτης." Perhaps this explanation was necessary.

PROVINCIAL.

EASTBOURNE.—The morning and evening concerts, given last month in the Assembly Rooms, by Mdlle Teresa Bonini, the well known vocalist and harpist, of Brighton, were very successful. Mdlle Bonini sang Schubert's "Ave Maria," Gounod's "Quando a te liete," "The blind girl to her harp," and the "Mocking bird." Mdlle Bonini also joined in several concerted pieces with Madame Cassinello, Mr C. Baines, and Mr Charles Newton. The instrumental portion of the concerts was varied and select. Beethoven's pianoforte Sonatas in E flat and in D minor were well played by Miss Fanny Pieczonka. Mr A. Dumsday, a good cornet, also gave two olos with effect.

SIMS REEVES AT BIRMINGHAM.

Mr Sims Reeves may always count upon an enthusiastic reception from his Birmingham friends; and when he displays (as he did last night) a willingness to comply with the wishes of his hearers, and is ready, when called upon, to give an additional song as a reply to an encore, he may depend upon exciting universal approbation. It is our pleasant duty to record that Mr Reeves is still in full possession of his extraordinary vocal powers. We knew, indeed, that his style would always be distinguished by the highest artistic finish. It is, perhaps, refinement of expression, above all else, that has given our greatest tenor his exalted position; and without that refinement the most wonderful natural gifts would be of little avail. Sims Reeves, unusually endowed, has, by diligent study of the highest forms of art, attained to a perfection unapproached by any of his fellows. In Blumenthal's "Message" he exhibited a perfect command over passages of tenderness and passion. In Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud" he showed himself a master in the interpretation of the melodious dramatic; and in Dibdin's "Tom Bowling" fully maintained his reputation as the foremost exponent of our grand old nautical airs. Each verse of each song called forth enthusiastic applause, and more than once the noise of the cheering was deafening. In reply to a re-demand, made by long-continued clapping of hands and acclamations, after Balfe's ballad, Mr Reeves delighted the audience with "My Pretty Jane," which, it is scarcely requisite to add, was given with the highest refinement of expression.

ONE WHO LOOKED ON AND HEARD ON, AND WONDERED IF WE SHOULD EVER HAVE ANOTHER TENOR LIKE JOHN SIMS REEVES.

Birmingham, October, 1875.

TINCTORIS.

It was once supposed that the well-known Flemish musician, Tinctoris, was born at Nivelles, but modern research has completely proved the untruthfulness of the tradition. It is now an established fact that Tinctoris first saw the light at Poperinghe. Notwithstanding this, the inhabitants still cling to the delusion that he was born here, and recently inaugurated a monument to his memory, in presence of the Minister of the Interior and of Public Works. M. Le Hardy de Beaulieu, deputy, was invited to attend, but, instead of coming, sent a letter of which the following is a portion:—

"It would be absurd on my part, after the light thrown on the subject, to assist in inaugurating a monument on which will be inscribed; 'Born at Nivelles,' when everyone knows that this is inexact, and that the only tie which connects Tinctoris to your town is a prebendaryship. I refuse to make one in rendering Nivelles, which has done nothing to deserve such an outrage, the object of the jokes of the public in Belgium and abroad. Tinctoris's place was in the dust of special libraries. He should have been left there. Is it proposed to raise statues to all the musicians in the universe? If not, why raise a statue to Tinctoris rather than to Orpheus, Meyerbeer, Rossini, or Paganini? Is it because they were not born at Poperinghe?"

To say the very least of this, it may fairly be regarded as outspoken.

GROKER ROORES.

MDLLE TATE'S annual concert took place in St George's Hall, and attracted a large and fashionable audience. It is so seldom that precocious talent preserves its character when subjected to the training necessary to render it artistic, that the career of Mdlle Tate has long been watched with interest by those who perceived in her early displays indications of unusual ability. That Mdlle Tate has not confined her studies to any particular school, but has formed her style upon an intimate acquaintance with the works of the old and new masters, was evident from the manner in which she played Beethoven, Bach, Chopin, and Liszt. No pieces could have been better selected to test the abilities of the young pianist. A firm touch and characteristic rigidity of style marked the performance of Bach's music; expression heightened the charm of Beethoven; whilst accurate execution and great digital power made Chopin and Liszt effective illustrations of modern art. The success of Mdlle Tate was legitimately achieved. The vocalists were Miss Marie Duval, Miss Mary Rolt, and Herr Werrenrath; the violinist was Herr Capellmeister Rydl; the violoncellist was Herr Daubert, and the accompanist Herr Lehmeyer.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

If there is one quality more than another with which the British public fairly deserves to be credited, it is that of constancy to its old favourites; and a more striking instance of this could hardly have been found than at Mr W. Pyatt's concert, on the 20th inst., when Mr Sims Reeves constituted the principal attraction. Of the weather, that most important element when the muses are appealed to, one could only quote the words of the poet—"The rain it raineth every day;"—for there had been a steady downpour for something like forty hours; and ominous were the reports as to the sale of tickets, the reserved seats being said to be "shy." Night came, but with it no cessation of the work of Jupiter Pluvius, and yet the Town Hall was literally besieged, some two hours before the time for the concert to begin, by an eager crowd, who, when admitted, filled every nook and corner of the vast building, perching themselves up in the windows, thronging under the orchestra and out-of-the-way places, where seeing was out of the question, and hearing problematical. Such devotion had its reward; for rarely or ever has our greatest singer displayed his gifts to more advantage. The welcome accorded to him by the delighted audience, after his nearly two years' absence, was enough to move the susceptibilities of the strongest-nerved. Mr Reeves is tolerably accustomed to this kind of thing; but yet it would seem to have stimulated him on the present occasion, for his singing of "The Message," "Come into the garden, Maud," "My Pretty Jane," and "Tom Bowling," was so replete with delicacy, refinement, and expression, that the whole may be shortly summed up as perfection. The encore accorded to the second-named song served but to whet the appetite of some of his hearers, who would not rest satisfied with the twice-repeated acknowledgment of the applause to Dibdin's pathetic ballad, but persisted in their demonstrations. Birmingham is notorious for endeavouring to exact encores, and, practically, to obtain eighteenpence for its shilling—an unruly knot of young men usually distinguishing themselves by their utter regardlessness of the annoyance inflicted on their neighbours.

In addition to Mr Sims Reeves, Mdme Cave-Ashton, a lady with a light, pleasing, sympathetic soprano voice, hardly powerful enough for the Town Hall, but managed with artistic effect, Miss Helen D'Alton, whose singing does credit to her instructress, Mrs Reeves, and Signor Foli, whose powerful voice has lost none of its attraction, successfully contributed to the vocal portion of the programme; while Mdlle Bertha Brousil (violin) and Mr Nicholson (flute) lent the necessary instrumental variety, with honour to themselves and satisfaction to their hearers, Mr Sidney Naylor maintaining his reputation as conductor.

The Festival Choral Society's first concert deserved better support than was accorded to it, despite a programme comprising Rossini's Stabat Mater (why do we never hear either of the other Stabats?), Mendelssohn's Lauda Zion, and Spohr's "God, Thou art great." In the first-named the soprano part was sustained, with artistic finish, by Mdme Sinico-Campobello; but the effect of the "Inflammatus" was drowned by the orchestra and organ, the former being too loud throughout. To Miss Enriquez fell the contralto solo, "Fac ut portem" sung in a manner to justify the applause which followed; while Mr Vernon Rigby's capabilities were powerfully exemplified in the tenor music—"Cujus animam" coming in for the largest share of approval; and Mr Whitney's full-toned bass voice found ample scope in "Pro peccatis." In Mendelssohn's Lauda Zion, Miss Emma Beasley, the soloist, met with a cordial reception from her fellow-townsmen, who are not slow to recognise native talent. This young lady has a voice worth cultivating; and, if she will accept the applause as an encouragement and incentive to study (instead of—as is too often the case—regarding it as a tribute to perfection), may make a useful addition to the rank of soprano vocalists. Mr Stockley displayed his accustomed skill as conductor, and the choruses were, as a whole, satisfactory.

Of the Nilsson concert and Carl Rosa Company something next week.

LISZT AND RUBINI IN HOLLAND.*

In 1843 Rubini decided on quitting the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, and for the following reason. He had been promised the post of professor of singing at our Conservatory of Music, and with the post was to be joined the cross of a Knight of the Legion of Honour. For Rubini the cross was the height of his ambition and the crowning glory of his brilliant career. Convinced that the promise made him could not be illusory, he informed his friends in Italy of it. In reply, they wrote to the Chevalier Rubini, as though his nomination had been an accomplished fact. Unfortunately for Rubini he was doomed to be disappointed; the promised cross was refused him. In his humiliation he determined not to appear again at the Italian Opera, Paris, though for him it had been the scene of nothing but triumphs. Profiting by this unfortunate occurrence, Liszt offered to make a tour with the great artist through Holland and Belgium. They set out in the month of October, accompanied by Mad. Rubini. They had as secretary a man who had followed Liszt in all his peregrinations, and whose devotion was equalled only by his cleverness. His name was Belloni. He was charged with the material organisation of the concerts. His history deserves a chapter to itself, and we shall devote one to it. They shaped their course to the Hague. Liszt had given his companion hopes that, after hearing him, the King of Holland would give the ribbon which France had just denied. They made a triumphal entry into the town. Gaily decorated carriages came to meet them, and they passed under arches of flowers into their hotel. Immense posters were placarded on the walls. But the prices of admission to the first concert announced were exorbitant. Never had they been so high. At the appointed time the doors were opened. After the lapse of an hour only seventeen persons had answered the invitation of the two artists.

Liszt was the first to appear on the platform. He cast an uneasy glance upon the audience, and then, without being disconcerted, played with marvellous talent, as though he had been in the presence of thousands of hearers. Rubini appeared in his turn, but, thinking the public had been misled as to the hour of the concert, immediately went back again. It was with difficulty he was prevailed upon to re-appear and sing. The enthusiasm of the seventeen auditors passed all bounds. Touched by this cordial reception, Liszt, after having played his "Hungarian March," bowed amid the noise of the applause, and delivered the following address to the seventeen applauders:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen" (there were three ladies among the audience), "We are profoundly grateful to you for the sympathetic reception you have accorded us, and we shall never forget this evening. You are not numerous; our hotel is opposite; do us the honour of coming and sharing our supper."

The seventeen auditors, thinking, doubtless, from the very high price of admission, that the supper formed a part of the programme, followed the two artists, and remained at table till three o'clock in the morning. The next day Belloni, after an airing through the town, came to the conclusion that they had nothing to hope from so inartistic a population. He advised, therefore, Liszt and Rubini to start, without the least delay, for Amsterdam. Poor Rubini, who reckoned upon the Dutch cross, saw his hopes once more frustrated. At the moment of their leaving, a somewhat warm altercation arose between the two partners. Rabelais' quarter of an hour had struck; Belloni brought his account book. Rubini glanced over the expenses and read:—

	Fr.
Paid for ovation-carriages	400
Paid for flowers and crowns	250
Paid for advertisements, posters, and paragraphs .	800
Expenses of the concert	600
Supper for the company	225
Total . . .	2,275

Mad Rubini protested against the excessive amount of this bill, and would not pay her share. Rubini refused to continue the journey. Liszt, always grand and generous, fearing to be left alone, paid all expenses for the two. At Amsterdam, things were different. The receipts were on a par with the success. From Amsterdam Rubini and Liszt proceeded to Gotha, where the Duke of Saxe-Coburg had expressed a wish to hear them. After the first concert he sent Liszt the cross of his Order, and begged him to hand Rubini a snuff-box ornamented with brilliants. Liszt, foreseeing how disagreeably Rubini would be affected by the present intended for him, went to the Duke and got him to change the snuff-box for a ribbon. Rubini had at length found a sovereign who deigned to crown his wishes. The same day, he wrote seventy letters to friends in Italy, informing them of the event. This time he was really a Chevalier. His cross assuredly marked the happiest day in his life.

MUSIC IN CALCUTTA.

(From our Correspondent.)

The Allen Opera Company opened, on the 15th instant. The Corinthian Theatre, filled with an elegant audience, was rendered exceedingly lively by the number of Punkah-Wallahs in every part. But for them, the heat would have been unbearable; as it was it was distressing. The fame of Miss Alice May had preceded her, and when she emerged from her cloak as the page in Satanella, there was a burst of applause. A few minutes sufficed to place her en rapport with her auditors, and her first recitative, "Once more the page I cease to play," brought down the house. At the conclusion of "There's a power whose sway," she was vociferously applauded and recalled. Since then she has appeared in Maritana, The Bohemian Girl, and The Grande Duchesse. The public of Calcutta have confirmed what other countries have said of her talent. Witness the Indian Daily News of to-day:—

"Miss Alice May than whom a more charming artist never came to India, she is equal to all she undertakes, and deserving of the many laurels she has gained elsewhere. An accomplished singer, with a voice of fine timbre, fresh and well cultivated, a charming and finished manner, she carries all before her. Her stage knowledge is of the most perfect kind."

Of the company at large some doubts existed at first, partly because the house is very bad for sound, and partly because they had scarcely recovered from a long voyage by sea and land. Of Mr Allen the Daily News says:—

"Mr G. B. Allen is a perfect conductor and an excellent musician. It is to be hoped that he will produce his own charming and sparkling opera, Castle Grim."

It is a pity that the company opened so early, for the heat is too great to allow people thoroughly to enjoy any amusement in a crowded theatre. In another month cool evenings may be expected, and the Viceroy (who takes the Corinthian Theatre under his special patronage, as well as the Prince of Wales during his visit), and the élite will return to town and a brilliant season may be expected.

DÜSSELDORF.

(From a Correspondent.)

The new conductor, Herr Courvoisier, from Frankfort, has entered upon his duties at the Stadttheater, his predecessor, Herr Kochner, who discharged them for many years, undertaking the curatorship of the library. With a view to the magnificent new theatre which will be opened in November, the band has been increased, and now numbers forty-two members.—Herr Nachbauer, from Munich, lately played a round of characters here, but the management was considerably out of pocket, as the theatre was never more than half filled, during his engagement.—The Vocal Associations are preparing for the winter. Ratzenberger's will open its series of five concerts with Rubinstein's Paradise Lost. The General Vocal will begin with Handel's Messiah, and the Bach Association with some less important works. Herr Ratzenberger, also, has thoughts of getting up a series of Chamber Music Evenings, for compositions by old and modern masters.

"Within the last few days," says a Plymouth paper, "Madame Nilsson has, in the fulfilment of her engagements, visited Belfast, Dublin, Brighton, London, and Plymouth." More has been done since then, as many of our correspondents and readers are aware.

Mr Fly played trumpet accompaniment to Madame Christine Nilsson's "Let the bright seraphim" at the recent concert in the Plymouth Guildhall. "Fly can go high," writes a correspondent, without what the late Mr Chorley would have called "wing peril."

Yesterday an auburn-haired lad of 10 summers, living on Beech street, got down the big silver castor during his mother's temporary absence, and, as he rolled it back and forth across the kitchen, he sang: "Dearest Mother, thou hast left us." An Eastern funny man, whose wit is mostly made up of stolen ideas, has invented a charming story about Chicago hotel-keepers, who, he says, now require travellers to pay in advance. According to the story, one traveller, not appreciating the change of affairs, was questioned by a clerk, who said, "You will not object to paying before you go to your room, sir?" "Certainly not: make out your bill." "For how long, sir?" "Well," says the stranger. "you may charge me for about ten minutes, on the European plan. By the end of that time I think I shall be at an hotel where the clerks wear smaller diamonds and have more confidence in human nature.

A committee has been formed at Florence for the purpose of celebrating, next May, the centenary of Cristofori, supposed inventor of the piano. The principal feature of the celebration will be international concerts on a large scale. The Abbé Liszt has promised to play.

Mdme Viardot has resigned her position of professor at the Paris Conservatoire because predominance is given to opéra-comique over opera; because a number of teachers are engaged to give lessons to the same pupil; and because, in a recent distribution of prizes by the jury, one of her pupils, Mdlle Belgirard, was unjustly set aside.

Nym Crinkle writes in the New York World: "I am told by a Broadway milliner that those who appear in the sanctuary every Sunday in new bonnets have been supplied regularly and gratuitously by up-town houses. The ladies recompense the houses by mentioning the names of their firms when their bonnets are admired. How shocked those dear creatures would be if their beloved pastor should appear in his pulpit Sunday morning with a placard on his breast inviting his congregation to buy their underclothing of Jones & Johnson." There are a number of pretty girls in Chicago, observes the Chicago Tribune, who would like to have their practice become common here. They would wear better bonnets than they now do.

ORGAN RECITAL.—The large hall connected with the Bow and Bromley Institute was crowded to excess on Saturday evening last, on the occasion of an organ recital being given by Dr C. G. Verrinder. The programme consisted of the overture to Egmont (Beethoven); Concerto, No. 12 (Handel); Trio for the organ (Bach); Offertoire (Batiste); Choral Song and Fugue (Wesley); Grand March to Schiller (Meyerbeer). Dr Verrinder was loudly applauded after each piece. Miss Jessie Giles, of the London Academy of Music, sang songs by Handel and Molloy, and pleased the large audience by her fresh voice and clear intonation. The performance was one of the most successful that have been given.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—On Monday and Wednesday next Buatur, the great Continental prestidigitateur from the Egyptian Hall, will perform at the Alexandra Palace. On Tuesday and Thursday Mr Phelps and the Gaiety Company will perform in the theatre. On the former of these days Mr Phelps will represent his famous character of Job Thornberry in John Bull; on Thursday he will play Sir Pertinax McSycophant in the Hypocrite; on Saturday there will be the first of the series of Saturday Popular Concerts. On that evening there will be an illuminated promenade. Handel's oratorio, Esther, will be produced for the first time since the year 1757, on Saturday next.

"THE MAID OF ATHENS."—Mr Richard Edgcumbe writes:—"The announcement made by the Greek journals of the death of Mrs Black, known to the world as 'The Maid of Athens,' is one which will not fail to interest the many admirers of Byron. I should not have presumed to trespass on your valuable space but for the reason that some misapprehension seems to exist as to the age she had attained at the time of her death, which, in the announcement made in The Times of Thursday, is set down at 76 years. It is, of course, well known to most people that Byron made the acquaintance of Theodora Macri and her three daughters, Teresa, Katinka, and Mariana, in February, 1810, just 65 years ago. In a letter written by the poet to his friend Mr Henry Drury at this time, he mentions the three Graces in the following words:—'I am dying for love of three Greek girls at Athens, sisters. I lived in the same house. Teresa, Mariana, and Katinka are the names of the three divinities; all of them under 15.' Now, it is very well known that the eldest, Teresa, was the one he addressed as 'Maid of Athens,' and I am inclined to think that she must at that time have been at least fourteen years of age—a supposition based upon an account given of them by Mr W. H. Williams in his Travels in Italy and Greece. Supposing, then, that the Maid of Athens was a little over fourteen years old in February, 1810, she cannot have been much under 80 years of age at the time of her death, and it is not without a pang that I recall an account given of Mrs Black's poverty by, I think, Mr Finlay a few years since, when an appeal was made in her behalf with but scant, if any, result. Byron's friends are all gone, save one, the dauntless Edward Trelawny, who enjoyed the poet's confidence and accompanied him to Greece. Byron's servants are all gone, save one, William Childs, a beadle in Golden Square. But in their place we have those honourable men who cling to his name, and who have shown their reverence for his memory by a tardy but just endeavour to set him on the pinnacle reared by his towering genius. That something associated with Byron should have passed away is one of those sad but inevitable consequences of the march of time; let us, at least, take comfort in the thought that there is still something left."

POTSDAM.—Herren Barth, De Ahna, and Hausmann, from Berlin, lately gave the first of a series of Concerts for Chamber Music in the large room of the Barberini Palace. The programme included Mendelssohn's C minor Trio (Op. 66), Haydn's C major Trio, and Beethoven's B flat Trio (Op. 97).

BASLE.—The splendid new Town Theatre was worthily inaugurated with Mozart's Don Juan. Situated in one of the finest quarters of the town, and in the midst of a number of public edifices, it presents an imposing aspect, both inside and out. The stage, which is very deep and very lofty, is furnished with all the mechanical contrivances due to modern invention. The scenery is magnificent. The auditorium can seat about 1,400 spectators.

GOTTENBURG (Sweden).—The Götheborg Posten informs us that Mdme Trebelli and her artist-companions continue their journey of triumphs through the country. At the same time, a Swedish contralto, Mdlle Victoria Bunsen, with less ostentation, but not with less success, has been heard in several towns in our neighbourhood. Mdlle Bunsen, who last year created a furore, with the modesty that distinguishes real talent, has not sung here this season, thinking, perhaps, of the proverb, "No one is a prophet in his own country." We, however, are of opinion that Mdlle Bunsen can "hold her own" against any other contralto. We hope to welcome her next year, and to show that, even in her native country, her talent is appreciated.

LÜBECK.—Our distinguished and energetic Music Director, Herr Gottfried Herrmann, gave an extra soirée musicale on the 16th October, for the benefit of the intended monument to the memory of Dr Louis Spohr, in Cassel. The result was in every respect gratifying, and the execution of the programme, which consisted only of the compositions of Concertmaster Spohr, was highly creditable to all concerned. The following is the programme:—1. String Quartet, Op. 74, No. 3, in D minor; 2. Two songs for baritone, with piano and violin accompaniment; 3. Quintet for piano and strings, Op. 130—the piano part brilliantly played by Fräulein Clara Herrmann; 4. Grand Fantasia on themes by Handel and Vogler, for harp and violin—excellently performed by Fräulein Ida Herrmann and her father, Music Director Herrmann; 5. Nonett for violin, tenor, violoncello, double basso, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn. The concert was well attended, and the graceful act of pietät for Master Spohr reflects very creditably on Music Director Herrmann.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

PROFESSOR AUGUSTUS WILHELMJ.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY PROFESSOR RICHARD WUERST, RÔYAL PRUSSIAN DIRECTOR OF MUSIC.

(Translated by JAMES FRANCIS TROWERS.)

The Neue Berliner Musikzeitung brings, under vol. xxviii., page 17, a biography of Augustus Wilhelmj, written by the composer and historian, Professor Doctor Richard Wuerst. We have chosen the following extracts from the life of this young violinist, thinking they will interest English readers.

Augustus Emil Daniel Frederic Victor Wilhelmj, the descendant of a very old and highly respectable German family, was born on the 21st September, 1845, at the ancient town of Usingen, in the former duchy of Nassau, now belonging to Prussia, his father being Barrister and Doctor-at-Law of the Rôyal Prussian Supreme Court.* The mother of Augustus Wilhelmj, Charlotte, née Petry, has played no small part in her time as songstress and pianist, having received her musical education from Privy Counsellor Anthony André, Marco Bordogni, and Frederic Chopin.

Wilhelmj received his first lesson on the violin from Conrad Fischer, Director of Music of the Duke of Nassau, at Wiesbaden. Mr Fischer proved himself an excellent teacher. Wilhelmj must have made very great and rapid progress then. At the time, about the beginning of 1850, when the eminent songstress, Henriette Sontag (Countess Rossi), happened to visit Wilhelmj's family at Wiesbaden, the young violinist, only seven years old, played in her presence with such exactness, beauty of sound, and original tone, that, quite enraptured, she embraced and kissed him, exclaiming, "You will be the German Paganini!"

Under the tuition of Fischer, the eminent talents of Wilhelmj developed themselves amazingly. The boy did not only in his youth cause great sensation owing to his full, mellowy, grand tone, but also to his great musical hearing capacity. He could, for instance, tell any single note of an accord, and had even the gift of naming each single sound amongst the greatest chaos with exactness and certainty.

In November, 1853, Wilhelmj heard and played for the first time one of the quatuors of Haydn. The boy not only kept time, but played with a certainty and tact as if he had been playing these quatuors for years.

On the 8th of January, 1854, Wilhelmj appeared for the first time in public. This took place at a concert given for benevolent purposes at Limburg on the Lahn. His second appearance took place at Wiesbaden, the 17th of March, 1856, at the Theatre Royal. This concert was given for the benefit of the Poor Old Men Asylum. Wilhelmj enraptured the public.

Dr Wilhelmj, the father, had, in spite of the great musical talents of his son, wished him to get learned in the law. First, after many resistances, however, he gave way to the indefatigable entreaties of his son, and agreed for him to dedicate himself to the musical art, but this only in case one of the great musicians of the day had examined him and declared him to be competent.

In the spring of 1861 Wilhelmj went for this purpose, having recommendations of Prince Wittgenstein to Franz Liszt, at Weimar, for being examined. During this examination, which was to decide his whole career, he played before the great man Louis Spohr's eighth concerto (Scena Cantante), and Hungarian airs by Henry Ernst. F. Liszt, who accompanied him on the piano, immediately perceived that he had to do with no common talent, but with one possessed of extraordinary musical endowments. After he had played some smaller pieces a prima vista, Liszt left the piano and exclaimed:—

"What, and they were considering which career you should choose! Why, you are born for music, and if the fiddle had not been invented, it would have had to be invented for you especially. Young man, study diligently, and you may depend on it that the world will yet talk of you."

Some days after this, Liszt went with his new protegé to Leipzig, to entrust his education to the guidance of Ferdinand David, saying, "I bring you the future second Paganini!"

From 1861 to 1864 Wilhelmj studied at the Rôyal Musical Academy at Leipzig. His teachers in theory were Hauptmann, Richter, and afterwards Joachim Raff, at Wiesbaden. Ferdinand David did superintend the education of Wilhelmj, and it is due to him that Wilhelmj has got such a classical style of playing solos or quatuors. Wilhelmj soon became the favourite scholar of the Conservatoire of Leipzig, and was considered a great wonder by his colleagues. Ferdinand David did often with no small pride remark "that there were no difficulties existing Wilhelmj could not easily surmount."

At an examination of the scholars of the Academy taking place on the 9th April, 1862, Wilhelmj attained immense success. Nobody could ever recollect any one before having met with such applause. He played the "Concerto Pathétique" of Ernst.

On the 24th November, 1862, Wilhelmj performed for the first time, at the Leipzig "Gewandhaus Concerts," the "Concerto after Hungarian manner" by Josephus Joachim. He lived at the house of his teacher, David, and it was here he made the acquaintance of David's niece, Baroness de Liphardt, whom he espoused on the 29th May, 1866. Owing to this connection, he got related to the renowned Prince of Liven. The family Liphardt belongs to the oldest and noblest family of the Russian Baltic provinces.

A very severe illness, typhus fever, which overtook him shortly afterwards, prevented Wilhelmj for some time following his studies; but, as soon as he was cured, he studied again with his usual zeal. His first concert tour was in the fall of 1865, in Switzerland. In 1866 he visited Holland; afterwards, Great Britain, where, thanks to the exertions of Jenny Lind, he appeared before the public, for the first time, at Covent Garden Theatre, in one of the concerts of Alfred Mellon. Wilhelmj caused unexampled sensation; every one thought himself back again in the time of Nicolo Paganini. On the 20th January, 1867, Wilhelmj played for the first time at Paris, at the popular concerts for classical music given by Pasdeloup in the Circus Napoléon. The newspapers were unanimous in declaring that Wilhelmj was the most perfect violinist they had ever heard, calling him "le nouveau Paganini." After all these successes, Wilhelmj returned again to the Rhine, as the French papers proudly said, "Inconnu hier, le vôila célèbre aujourd'hui."

In the fall of 1867 Wilhelmj went to Italy. At Florence he had, in acknowledgment of his grand, incomparable classical play, the title "Protector of the Societa di Quartette" conferred on him. January 1868 he went to Russia, being invited by the Grand-Duchess Helena Pawlowna of Russia. At St Petersburg Wilhelmj lived with Hector Berlioz, the "French Beethoven," and other celebrities of the Palais Michel. He took a share in many interesting musical evenings, for which the salon of this art-loving and ingenuous Grand-Duchess was known. It was here that Hector Berlioz spoke the now well-known words:

"I have never before heard such an eminent, enrapturing, noble tone as Wilhelmj's, and I must admit that his way of playing is quite phenomenal."

On the 27th January, 1868, Wilhelmj appeared for the first time in a great concert at St Petersburg, where he met with the accustomed applause. During the season of 1868-69, he visited again Switzerland, France, and Belgium. In the season of 1869-70 he made a great concert tour, with Mr Santley, to the principal towns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, everywhere meeting with the greatest applause. During the bad times of the French war, Wilhelmj did very much to ameliorate the sufferings of the poor and wounded of this unhappy war. He is known for his great benevolence. He gave concerts for the above purpose not only at Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Mayence, but at many other places. In 1871 we find the young violinist at Holland, where he met even with more success than in 1866. At the university town of Leyden he was agreeably surprised by being received with torchlight procession. During 1871-72 he gave concerts in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

He first undertook a concert tour in his own country in the winter of 1872-73, when he visited the north of Germany, the Russian Baltic provinces, Tolen, Galizia, and the Austrian Crownlands; the same journey he accomplished again in March, 1874.

Wilhelmj put in his first appearance at Berlin on the 22nd October, 1872, where he played at the Singacademie, and at Vienna, on the 23rd March, 1873, at the Great Music-hall, the success he attained in both these capitals being enormous. Rarely has artist been honoured and acknowledged in such a way before; not only critics, but also the public, were unanimous in their verdict that they had heard one of the greatest violinists of any epoch.

Wilhelmj has tried composing, with much success, and has written some very effective pieces for the violin, some original songs, also a great marriage cantate for soli, chorus, and orchestra, and finally some very good sacred music. In regard to his speciality as a violinist, it is acknowledged that he stands equally as high as a soloist and quatuor player. Particular mention deserves his play in the last quatuors of Beethoven, and in compositions of latter times. Great and indisputable merit is due to Wilhelmj for his successful endeavours in promoting the sound capacity of his instrument. The way he manages to produce double notes is new altogether, and surpasses in this point even Paganini. The same must be admitted of his great, mellowy, noble tone—the result of a newly, deeply-studied system.

Wilhelmj is a very curious character, who must be well known if one shall not run the risk of misunderstanding him, and he would no doubt have given great material for the spirited pen of Charles Dickens; but, for all that, he has the very genuine natural character of a thoroughbred artist. He has an eminent gift to be witty, and has great readiness in replying. On the whole, he is very excellent company. During the summer time he stays at Wiesbaden, along with his family, studying.

Thus much of the life of this youthful violinist, from whom the greatest things may be expected in time to come, and whose first appearance this season took place at the Royal Albert Hall, on January 20th, 1875.

PARIS SCRAPS.

(From our Parisian Scrapper.)

M. Faure has completely recovered from his dangerous illness, and is at present attending the rehearsals of Don Juan, which M. Halanzier will now be enabled to produce speedily. It is on the cards, however, that Faure may not wait till Mozart's great work is ready, but make his re-appearance at an earlier date in Hamlet.

Not a very long time ago, M. Halanzier augmented the salaries of the members of the Chorus at the Grand Opera. He has now done the same for the members of his Orchestra. The Committee of the Association des Artistes Musiciens addressed him a highly flattering letter of thanks, and so did the members of the Orchestra. Not content with this, the latter did more. They accompanied their missive with an elegant silver vase, most delicately chased, and bearing the inscription: "To M. Halanzier, from the Musicians of the Orchestra of the Opera, 1875." In their letter these gentlemen say, among other things, that it will be their aim to prove their gratitude by exhibiting the utmost zeal in the discharge of their duties. It is to be hoped that they will at once commence by being more free in attendance at rehearsal. It is a general complaint that the Orchestra of the Opera does not rehearse enough either for its own reputation or for that of the establishment to which it belongs. To take a case in point. Last week, M. Couturier, a lauréat of the Conservatory, having obtained the necessary dispensation from the military authorities, made his début as Guillaume Tell in Rossini's masterpiece of the same name. He certainly did not achieve a great success. His voice struck one as not sufficiently strong for so vast a house, and his acting showed that he was only a novice in the histrionic art. But, even had he been ten times more gifted, he could hardly have come off with flying colours. He played the character without any band-rehearsal. This was not fair to a beginner. Apart from this, however, it is a perilous leap from the benches of the Conservatory to the boards of the Grand Opera. Formerly, before braving the verdict of that tribunal, artists were accustomed to try their 'prentice voices at establishments of lesser note. Thus Mesdes Carvalho, Nilsson, Gueymard, MM. Faure, Gailhard, and Bosquin, with many more, first came out at the Théâtre-Lyrique or the Opéra-Comique. Others made their preliminary essays in the Provinces, while others again, among whom Mesdes Viardot, Damoreau, Alboni, Cruvelli, MM. Duprez, Levasseur, Mario, Gardoni, and Naudin, had sung upon the Italian stage. M. Couturier possesses a certain amount of talent, but was ill-advised in selecting the Grand Opera as the starting-point of his career.

M. Mermet's Jeanne d'Arc stands a chance of being produced in the early part of 1876. It is in four acts and six tableaux, for which the composer has furnished the libretto as well as the music. The cast is as follows: Jeanne d'Arc, Mdlle Krauss; Agnès Sorel, Mdlle Daram; Charles VII., M. Faure; Gaston de Metz, M. Salomon; Richard, M. Gailhard; Jeanne's Father, M. Menu; an Astrologer, M. Caron; Ambroise de Luré, M. Gaspard; a Sergeant, M. Battaille. The first act takes place at Domrémy, and the second at Chinon, in the Royal Palace. The third act is divided into two tableaux, representing the French camp under the walls of Blois. The fourth act, also, is in two tableaux. One of these shows us a trench under the walls of Orleans, and the other, the consecration of the King in the Cathedral at Rheims. The most wonderful reports are current touching the beauty of the scenery and magnificence of the dresses and properties being got ready for M. Mermet's work. Similar reports are current on the long-expected ballet of Sylvia, to be produced shortly after Jeanne d'Arc.

The Opéra-Comique is doing a respectable business with Mignon, La Dame Blanche, Le Val d'Andorre, Joconde, Richard Cœur de Lion, and Le Chalet. Piccolino is in active rehearsal, and Mireille will, shortly, once more see the light of the float.

At the Renaissance M. Vogel has achieved a succès d'estime with his comic opera, La Filleule du Roi, first represented in Brussels. Of course, his friends attribute the fact of his not having been more triumphant to the unsatisfactory nature of the libretto furnished by MM. Cormon and Deslandes. I will not pretend to decide what M. Vogel might have done, if he had had better materials to work upon. I only know what he has done, and that knowledge prompts me to prophesy that La Filleule du Roi will not obtain one of those runs of late frequent in this capital. The principal parts are in the hands of Mad. Peschard, Mdlle Luigini, Mdlle Blanche Miroir, MM. Vauthier and Dailly. M. Madier de Montjau conducted.

The grand fairy opera, entitled, Le Voyage dans la Lune, in four acts and twenty-three tableaux, words by MM. Leterrier, Vanloo, and Mortier, music by M. Offenbach, has been produced at the Gaîte with every appearance of a long and vigorous life. The scenery, by MM. Chéret, Cambon, and Cornil, is superlatively beautiful. The dresses, designed by M. Grévin, are something marvellous for elegance and originality. The libretto is gay, lively, and audaciously absurd, and the music—the music belongs, in my opinion, to the best that Offenbach has composed for some time past. I may mention, as among the most taking and clever numbers, Prince Caprice's address to the Moon, ending with the burden: "Papa, Papa, je veux la lune;" the chorus of astronomers; Fantasia's Romance; the chorus of little artillery men; the song of the "Charlatan;" and the ballet music. Mad. Zulmar Bouffar particularly distinguished herself as Prince Caprice, and found a Princess Fantasia worthy of her in the person of Mdlle Marcus, a former pupil and prize-winner at the Conservatory, who has deserted the Société des Concerts for opéra-bouffe. MM. Christian and Grivot are very good as Vlan I. and Microscope.

La Cruche Cassée is the title of a three-act comic opera just produced at the little Théâtre Taitbout—the libretto is by MM. Moinaux and Noriac; the music by M. L. Vasseur, who has been fortunate in his artists: Mad. Chaumont, Mdlle Céline Montaland, MM. Bonnet and Luguet. The verdict was favourable.

Mysterious hints are in circulation about the Théâtre-Lyrique, which, it is said, will soon be able to boast of a manager and a home. Can these hints have aught in common with the project broached by M. Adolphe Sax, some ten years ago, of a colossal operahouse for the people? All I know is that the project has been revived, and that a committee, including MM. Emile Girardin, Bardoux, Under-Secretary of State in the Ministry of Justice, Ambroise Thomas, Halanzier, Carvalho, Joncières, Reinach, Dennery, Détroyat, and Camille Doucet, are discussing its merits. Should their report be favourable, a company will probably be raised at once.

Gounod is going on favourably. He will soon have completely recovered. The same is true of M. C. Lamoureux.

MISS MINNIE HAUCK.

This young lady has taken a high place in the esteem of the Berliners, with whom she has, in a comparatively short time, become a great favourite. The critics, too, are as well inclined to her as the general public. Subjoined are extracts from a few of the notices since her appearance as a regular member of the company at the Royal Operahouse. The Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, writes as follows:—

"Yesterday evening Auber's Domino Noir was revived. The central figure is the part of Angela, for which partiality has always been evinced by singers, combining vocal fluency with dramatic talent. Our recollections take us back as far as Sophie Löwe, who created the part here. Without instituting comparisons, we beg to express to Miss Hauck our thorough approbation of the way in which she conceives and carries it out. She played admirably, and showed by her singing that she is a real artist. In summing up the performance of Miss Hauck's, we again come to the conclusion that in this young artist we have made the acquisition of a lady gifted with a voice, vocal art, and dramatic power. Like the sun she is not free from spots, but still she belongs to the race of suns."

With this luminous compliment we take leave of Herr Richard Wüerst, and proceed to the Preussische Zeitung:—

"Miss Minnie Hauck appeared yesterday at the Operahouse in Gounod's Margarethe, for the first time, as a newly engaged member of the company. By her 'Gastspiel,' which commenced in the month of November last year, with Mignon, and was continued for seven evenings, she introduced herself here with ever-increasing success. The liberal applause bestowed on her by the public, more especially in the part previously sung by Mdme Lucca, paved the way for her engagement at the Royal Operahouse, and served to usher in honourably her return. Musical drama at the Royal theatre gains in Miss Hauck a new and eminent representative of artistic singing. In her we find a voice teeming with freshness and health; a tone able with its waves to fill the spacious building; and, moreover, an uncommonly pure intonation. With these elementary advantages Miss Minnie Hauck unites a sure command over the art resources of vocalism. The gentle, quiet way in which she takes a note, softly and piano, and then allows it to die away like an echo, has a magical effect. In the first meeting with Faust she gave proof of artistic skill. For the ideally naïve Gretchen of Goethe, this dwelling upon a high note would, dramatically speaking, not be appropriate. But, after all, is Gounod's Gretchen Goethe's Gretchen? It strikes us that the wonderful and long-sustained piano suited the coquettishly-drawn operatic heroine wonderfully. Miss Minnie Hauck sang the 'König von Thule' in a dreamy manner suited to the situation. The Jewel Waltz, which follows, was a genuine specimen of the ornate style. In the love-duet with Faust, the scene with her dying brother, and the prison scene, her fine intelligence and well coloured expression were in vivid keeping with the musical effect. This last was dramatically one of the most touching points in the performance. Applause and recalls, to which was added a shower of bouquets, greeted Miss Hauck both during and after the opera. This unanimous verdict was an expression of thanks to the Intendant-General, for securing an artist so eminent.

Dr Gumprecht, in the National Zeitung, says:—

"One of the best things as yet offered us in the varied repertory of Miss Minnie Hauck is her Angela. For music which speaks only in half tints, her unfailing supremacy over the most delicate gradations of sound is of striking importance. It is only in the second and third act that the dramatic significance of the part is brought out. Here the Arragonaise and its brilliant sequel afford the widest scope for readiness of execution."

Yet another critic says:—

"It was no easy task for an artist to assert herself in the principal character of the Domino Noir against the reminiscences cherished by the Berlin public of Mdme Artôt; but Miss Minnie Hauck has accomplished it. Her own peculiarities and those of the part agree perfectly with each other. Her vocal training, marked by high distinction and supported by a powerful and healthy voice; the clearness of her intellect, never vacillating as to the end and the means of expression; her skilful and delicate execution—all these were combined in a total performance which afforded a significant artistic treat, and, without doubt, will often be heard again with pleasure in the course of the ensuing winter."

Of a certainty, Miss Minnie Hauck has reason to feel pleased at her reception in Berlin. X.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

Herr Niemann has appeared as Eleazar in Halévy's opera of La Juive at the Royal Operahouse, but he does not seem to have made a hit. So I gather from what I have heard in conversation, or learnt from the papers, for I did not see him myself. Herr Ferdinand Gumbert, speaking of the performance, expresses himself thus in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung:—

"Herr Niemann, who, seven years ago, sustained the part of Eleazar on one occasion (and no more), has appeared in it to-day. The same want of a brilliant high register has caused him to fail in the attempt now as he failed before. The excess of nice gradations in delivery and acting proved more detrimental than advantageous to the performance as a whole. The fact is that, despite omissions, changes, and transpositions, Herr Niemann's strength was so exhausted in the fourth act (the culminating point of the character), that he had frequently recourse to the spoken word, and the grand air did not produce its proper effect. Even his oft-praised histrionic talent left the popular artist in the lurch; the power of impersonating Judaic peculiarities seems denied to the admirable representative of chivalry; his mimetics and the movements of his arms—especially in moments of excitement—contrasted with his walk and bearing. That Herr Niemann should aim at doing something new is certainly highly praiseworthy; so also is his again venturing upon an unsuccessful essay; but—there should be a possibility of success, and this is utterly out of the question. The fact that many tenors, with a brilliant high register, but with very little histrionic power, should achieve success as Eleazar, ought of itself to be for Herr Niemann a plain indication of the state of the case. Among the number of Eleazars whom I can remember, only one sung and acted equally well, and that was Roger."

Moral:

"Non cuivis hominum contingit adire Corinthum."

"It is not every tenor who can tackle the character of Eleazar." The other leading personages were confided to Mad. von Voggenhuber, Madlle Grossi, Herren Fricke and Schrötter.

It is said that the next novelty at the Royal Operahouse is to be Herr Hermann Götz's Widerspänstigen Zähmung (Taming of the Shrew). "It is said" that some hitch has occurred as regards Tristan und Isolde, Mad. Mallinger having positively refused to play Isolde.

The Winter Concerts of the Singacademie begin this evening (the 29th October) with Handel's Samson.

A short time since Mad. Adelina Patti and her husband, the Marquis de Caux, spent a day or two here, on their way to St Petersburgh, and visited the Thiergarten. As they were driving down one of the principal roads, a hackney-cab ran into their carriage, the pole of the former vehicle passing through the window of the latter. Fortunately no injury was sustained.

NEW YORK.—Mr Theodore Thomas, after having successfully terminated his Summer Night Concerts at the Central Park Gardens, has resumed his provincial concert tour with his unrivalled orchestra, accompanied by Mdlle Madeleine Schiller, as solo pianist, who has everywhere won golden opinions for her distinguished and highly-artistic performances, her selections comprising the highest and best of pianoforte works, as those of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Weber, &c., &c. Mr Thomas's concerts at the Central Park Gardens were, in every respect, a great success; and, with such interesting programmes, so splendidly performed, it is not to be wondered at. There were extra nights, devoted to the performance of the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Wagner, &c., &c. On the Mozart night, Mr Thomas introduced, with a particularly happy result, a Concerto for Harp and Flute, which, according to Jahn, Mozart wrote when in Paris. It is a work, full of beauties, such as only Mozart's genius could produce; and it is surprising how this work could have been, hitherto, so entirely neglected. It was performed most excellently by Mr Thomas's talented harpist, Mr Adolphus Lockwood, who is well known in London, and Mr Carl Wehner, a flute player of the first order. The concerto was so enthusiastically received that it had to be repeated in many of the concerts after, and forms now, also, a feature in Mr Thomas's provincial concerts. The grand orchestral works performed at the Summer Night Concerts comprised symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Raff, Spohr ("Consecration of Sound"), H. Hofmann's "Frithof" symphony, Hamerick's "Woodish Suite," a number of overtures by the best masters, and several selections from the works of Liszt, Wagner, &c.

MEFISTOFELE.

A New Italian Opera by a New Italian Composer.

(From a Special Italian Correspondent.)

On Monday, 4th October, at the Teatro Communale, at Bologna, took place the first representation of Mefistofele, an opera, in a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue, poetry and music of M. Anigo Boito. Many circumstances concurred to give to this performance the interest of a great artistic event. The name of the author—which, even among the most eager opponents, excites always the greatest interest—the desire of knowing the modifications that had been introduced in this opera, after it had been enacted at the Theatre of Scala in 1868, and then suspended by the authority for the sake of the violent disputes it had excited, and the choice of the public to submit to a second and definitive judgment of this opera; a clever, intelligent public, accustomed to the best music, far from violent partisans, as well as from systematical adversaries; a public who had the fortune of delivering its judgment, the first in Italy, on the merit of the Africaine, Don Carlos, Lohengrin, and Tannhäuser.

The success of the opera was splendid; more than twenty times the author was called to the proscenium by unanimous, sincere, spontaneous applause, and he was kindly led on by the excellent artists who interpreted his music, Mdlle Borghi-Mamo (counter-alto), Mr Campanini (tenor), and Mr Nannetti (bass). And these demonstrations of esteem and admiration, which became greater and greater each successive evening, were not excessive, for really few operas contain so many good qualities as we find in the vigorous work of M. Boito.

The Mefistofele—which more properly ought to be called Faust, because it comprehends all the life of the protagonist, as in like manner the Faust of Gounod ought to be entitled Margaret, for it comprehends only the episode of Gretchen—belongs, according to the character of the argument, to the opera legend. It could be much disputed whether the choice of Faust of Goethe, in order to work out of it a musical drama, were convenient; and though we are very prone to admit legends among the fanciful sources of arguments for musical dramas, we yet think that this wants some elements necessary to music.

A drama will strike the spectators, as much as they partake of the passions that move the persons of it. The supernatural produces in the human mind a vague impression, and this indefinite amazement can excite the strongest emotions, especially when we receive it by the indeterminate means of the sounds. But this impression is not produced by the supernatural itself, but by its intervening in the real life. A drama which were entirely acted and developed in imaginary regions, and in which only ideal beings took part, could excite in our mind a sense of admiration, but certainly it would not touch our hearts; for how could we conceive the feelings of natures quite different from ours? On the contrary, a drama in which a man had contact and relations with imaginary beings or worlds should produce in our mind many emotions; for, as we can put ourselves in the place of the protagonist, with whom we have communion of feeling, we can even partake of his sensations of joy, grief, astonishment, or fright.

M. Wagner—who, as we think, better than any other, has got into the spirit of the legend—gave us, in Lohengrin and Tannhäuser, two admirable examples of the manner in which the fantastical element must be used in the musical drama. Lohengrin and Venus are the two phantoms who exercise their influence on the passions of Elsa and Tannhäuser; but the mind of the spectator is entirely devoted to these persons, so that, when Elsa and Tannhäuser die, the drama is completed. Nobody longer cares for the two supernatural beings, which yet were the hinges of the action; and it would be a great error to think it possible to add a fourth act to bring us to see the unknown region of the cavaliers of the Holy Grail, or, on the Venusberg, the griefs of Venus.

According to these accounts, as we consider the Faust of Goethe, we perceive that the real and fantastical elements pass in it like a vision before the eyes of Faust and Mephisto. Margaret and Helena, the mountains of Harz and the fields of Pharsalus, the cave of Auerbach and the imperial Palace, quite different and contrary things, have their reason, and are mixed and joined together in an immense unity in the poem; for, as the hinge of it is the desire of the protagonist of knowing all, all must appear before him. But, to comprehend all this unity, it is necessary that we, in our mind, become almost the same thing with Faust, which, when we are reading, is quite possible to be done; for, considering Faust, not as a man, but as the representative of an idea, through which we can get by means of reasoning, we put ourselves in the place of the doctor.

In the musical drama, naturally, all the philosophical part is left out, and there remains only the action that develops on the stage. The unity of Faust disappears to give place to some scenes, and we can say that the protagonist himself changes according to the scenes that pass before him and us. The old doctor who studies theology, and walks with Wagner, is not, when we see him on the stage, the young lover of Margaret, nor the man climbing the rocks of the Brocken, nor the cavalier of the fifteenth century in love for Helena; on the contrary, the spectator who had put himself in the place of Faust, lover of Margaret, when this episode is finished, does not feel any need of following Faust in his after vicissitudes and transformations.

Nevertheless, the masterpiece of the German literature is so rich in colour, that it can easily seduce and attract any strong mind; and M. Boito, who was from his youth fond of this splendid subject, courageously undertook the hard work of reducing, into the brief forms of the melodrama, the vast idea of Goethe; his strength did not fail; and he succeeded. He who reads the drama of Mefistofele wonders how, in those few pages, the character and conceit of the poem from which it is worked out appear unchanged. From the prologue in Heaven to the ascension to Heaven of Faust, all the principal episodes receive their proportioned places: and in the first drama there was even the prologue in the theatre, which was as a preface; the whimsical scene of the gold in the imperial Palace; the fantastical acting, in which Helena and Paris were evoked; and the battle between the Emperor and the false Emperor described by an Intermezzo Sinfonico, with chorus, between the fourth and fifth acts. As the author presented his work on the stage, he wisely resolved, after the storms of the preceding acting, to take from his opera some parts which bore an excessive prolixity, and wanted interest on the stage. Some parts he modified; nevertheless, we hope it will be a complete edition of Mefistophele, for even the omitted parts do not want beauty, and should not be lost.

Brussels.—Most of the victims to the influenza having recovered, Robert le Diable has resumed its place in the bills of the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie. M. Sylva and Mdlle Vanden Berghen sustain the two principal characters in a way that meets with general approbation. M. Libert, as Raimbaut, is not so fortunate. His nervousness mars most of what he does. Mdlle Vanden Berghen has produced a favourable impression, also, in La Juive; not so, again, M. Libert, who, as Prince Leopold, displays neither the elegance nor the assurance of one so high placed. The other parts are confided to Mdlle Hamaekers, MM. Warot and Salomon.—The following, according to report, are the artists who will sing Verdi's Requiem in Belgium and France: — Signora Caruzzi-Bedogni, soprano, of the theatres at Genoa, Parma, Turin, Vienna, etc.; Mad. Barlani-Nini, mezzo-soprano, from the theatres of Milan, Florence, Rome, Turin, Genoa, Trieste, Barcelona, and other considerable cities; Sig. Belotti, tenor, a pupil of Sig. Lamperti, of Milan; Sig. Povoleri, bass. He created the part of the King, in Verdi's opera of Aïda, at the Scala, Milan. The conductor will be Sig. E. Muzio, who is to hold the same position next year at the Italian Opera, Paris, and who, for the last two years, directed the Italian companies engaged in America by the Brothers Strakosch.—The following are the works which were to be executed in the Collegial Church of St Michael and St Gudule, at the festivals of All Saints, under the direction of M. Fischer:—On Monday, November 1st, at 10 a.m., a Mass by the Cavaliere Giulio Roberti, Inspector of Schools at Florence; Offertorium, "Expectans expectavi," by B. Polak-Daniels, a Dutch composer, residing at Dresden. At 5.30 p.m., the same day, "Iste Dies," L. Cherubini; "Sub Tuum Præsidium," J. Danjou; "Te decet Laus," Leibl; and "Tantum ergo," P. Benoit. On Monday, 15th November, the King's fête, "Te Deum," F. Riga. On Monday, the 22nd November, the festival of St Cecilia, at 11 a.m., a Mass, by A. F. Woutera.

CHRISTINE NILSSON AT BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Morning News, in a notice of Messrs Harrisons' "first grand concert," in which Madame Nilsson took part, has the following about that accomplished songstress:—

"The most important incident of last night was the appearance here of Madame Christine Nilsson. It may be remembered that this enchanting songstress first visited Birmingham at the Triennial Festival of 1867. She was then just twenty-four years of age; but she had been a musician almost from her cradle. Up to the year in which she was sixteen she sang and played the violin at Swedish burgh fairs. On one occasion, when she was thus exhibiting, a gentleman of influence and sagacity heard her, and at once understood the nature of her talents. He placed her in a good school, and subsequently sent her to Paris for the completion of her general and musical education. On the 27th of October, 1860, she appeared for the first time before a Parisian audience, at the Théâtre Lyrique, as Violetta in La Traviata. Her success was triumphant; and on the morning following she was called upon by the management to sign an agreement for three years. In 1867 Madame Nilsson came to London, and during the season at Her Majesty's Theatre played Violetta, Margarita, Astrifiammante, and other leading parts. In following years she has been a bright particular star in Mr Mapleson's companies, enchanting all by her charming vocalisation, and everywhere making friends by her amiable disposition, and by her inexhaustible charities. Noble, and yet simple in her nature, Madame Nilsson has won the admiration and love of all who admire and love talent and virtue. The first piece set down in last night's programme for Madame Nilsson was the Air des Bijoux, from Gounod's Faust. She gave the whole of the scena, although the words only from the passage "O ciel" were printed in the programme books. Thus doing afforded Madame Nilsson a good opportunity for display of variety of style; the 'King of Thule' verses being sung with exquisite simplicity, and the passages expressive of astonishment and delight at the possession of the gems with brilliancy and power, and yet with the most perfect naturalness and grace. The conclusion of the waltz movement was the signal for an enthusiastic burst of applause, and, after being thrice recalled, Madame Nilsson gave the old Scotch ballad, 'Auld Robin Gray.' The first solo in the second part of the programme for the fair cantatrice was a new song by Sullivan, 'Let me dream again.' This being encored, in place of a repeat a substitution of the 'Minstrel Boy' was made, the interpretation being distinguished by characteristic expression and clear declamation. As her last solo, Madame Nilsson sang two Swedish melodies, (1) 'Le Printemps,' (2) 'Danse Dalekarlienne.' The first of these, remarkable for a mixture of playfulness and pathos, was exquisitely sung; the second, a minor melody, full of life and sparkle, brought into prominent notice Madame Nilsson's extraordinary facility in ornamentation. The splendid shake introduced at the conclusion of the melody excited the admiration of the audience to the utmost, and, after repeated recalls, a repetition was given. Again at the end the cheering was immense."

ST PETERSBURGH.—A new opera, Angelo, by a Russian composer, Cæsar Qui, is in preparation at the National Operahouse.

CARLSRUHE.—Herr Ferdinand Langer's romantic opera of Dornröschen is in active rehearsal at the Court Theatre under the direction of Herr Dessoff, and will be performed there for the first time on the 3rd December, the birthday of the Grand Duchess.

VENICE.—The Teatro Rossini has been thoroughly repaired and redecorated. It is now one of the most elegant and most comfortable theatres in Italy.—The Teatro Goldoni was to open for a short season, commencing on the 1st of the present month, and lasting up to December 10th. The first two operas performed were to be Un Ballo in Maschera and L'Ebreo.—The operas during the Grand Carneval Lent season at the Fenice will include La Contessa di Mons by the Cavaliere Laura Rossi, who will conduct it in person, and, in all probability, Lia, by Sig. Schira, whose Selvaggia was so eminently successful at the same theatre. There is, also, some talk of La Gitana, by Sig. Pisani. The ballets selected for representation are Ermanzia, by Sig. Pratesi, and Bacco ed Arianna, by Sig. Danesi.

WILHELMJ AND THE ORCHESTRA.

EVERY one who cares for music, and every one who cares for those without whose concurrence music, no matter how gloriously conceived, must remain silent on paper—written but not heard, except in the mind's ear of an exceptionally-gifted few—must feel gratified to know that between the distinguished violinist, Herr Wilhelmj, and his brethren of the Covent Garden orchestra, the most cordial sympathy has prevailed. We are informed that, at the termination of his engagement, Herr Wilhelmj wrote a letter, expressing his sense of indebtedness to the members of the orchestra for their hearty and friendly co-operation. This is as it should be, and all the more agreeable to record because the initiative proceeds from one who, like Herr Wilhelmj, is universally recognised both as an artist and a gentleman. We have not seen the letter, or a copy of the letter, referred to; but we are enabled to make our readers acquainted with the sympathetic reply of the Covent Garden orchestra, through their representative, Mr A.

Burnett, who occupies honourably the honourable post of "principal first violin":—

"HERR A. WILHELMJ—

"SIR,—I am desired by the members of the 'Covent Garden orchestra' to give you their best thanks for your most kind letter.

"That they have been connected in any way with your great success is to them a source of immense satisfaction; and they echo most cordially your hope—'That we may meet again, in the future, on the same amicable terms.'

"Wishing you the success that is yours by right of your glorious talent, I remain, in the name of the Covent Garden orchestra, your obedient servant, "A. BURNETT.

"Suffolk Lodge, Denmark Hill,
"October 30, 1875."

The straightforward language in which this answer to a spontaneous acknowledgment of obligation on the part of a truly great artist is couched enhances its worth. The whole, however, simply resolves itself into a genuine and unaffected interchange of courtesies—of latter times somewhat rare, and, therefore, the more acceptable.

P.S.—Since the foregoing was in type we have been favoured with a copy of Herr Wilhelmj's letter, which will be perused with no less interest than the other:—

"To the Gentlemen of the Orchestra, Covent Garden Promenade Concerts—

"GENTLEMEN,—Before taking my leave of the Covent Garden Concerts, I wish to convey to you my best thanks for the kind and sympathetic manner in which you have received me, and for the able aid you have afforded me during my performances with you. May I also express my appreciation of the great ability you display in the execution of your work, and of the unanimity that exists amongst you. I shall always retain a most pleasant remembrance of my short sojourn amongst you, and shall hope to meet you again, in the future, on the same amicable terms. Believe me, gentlemen, very faithfully yours, "AUGUST WILHELMJ.

"London, October 28th, 1875."

That Herr Wilhelmj and his gallant coadjutors will bear kindly remembrances of each other can hardly be questioned. Would it were ever so!

OBSTRUCTIONS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—A few weeks since, there appeared in the columns of your journal some preliminary observations, intended to introduce a second article from my pen, upon various details which, in my opinion, require reform at several of our London Theatres. Upon now looking at those observations, I experience a misgiving lest, like the head of an infantine victim to hydrocephalosity, they may prove rather out of proportion with what follows; that they may suggest a long-winded grace prefacing the hasty snack, facetiously dignified by the name of dinner, with which travellers at a railway station have scarcely time to choke themselves, ere the bell summons them to resume their journey.

The fact is that, since I addressed you, the Lord Chamberlain has issued a notice, condemning one of the abuses against which I was preparing to inveigh. For the sake of the public, I am delighted to see a nuisance abolished; but, at the same time, I am, in Parliamentary phrase, "free to confess" I wish his Lordship had waited a little longer. I might then have fancied that some part in doing away with the nuisance was due to me. At present I cannot possibly lay that flattering unction to my soul. As, however, the step taken by his Lordship has excited in certain quarters adverse criticisms, and exposed him to a charge of "muddling and meddling"—nay, even of having acted in a high-handed and arbitrary fashion—I may, perhaps, be permitted to offer a few comments upon what he has done.

In the communication to which I refer, the Lord Chamberlain directs attention to a practice which has been largely and steadily on the increase for some years past. I mean the practice of placing additional seats in various parts of the theatres, especially in the approaches to the stalls, whenever any especial entertainment attracted a more than usually numerous audience. On such occasions some portions of our theatres had come to resemble the Paris Boulevards on a fine summer's evening, or the walk by the side of Rotten Row in the height of the season, so bristling were they with chairs. His Lordship justly remarks that these additional seats would, probably, in case of fire, act as barricades; and that these barricades, improvised by officials unconscious of the mischief they were doing, might, by impeding the flight of the terrified and bewildered crowd, become productive of most deplorable and fatal results. He, therefore—and, as I consider, very correctly—expresses a wish, or, in other words, promulgates an order, that the practice may be discontinued.

But, supposing, for a moment—and I most humbly ask your pardon, Sir, for the preposterous nature of the supposition—that in all our Metropolitan Theatres, and not merely in a few exceptional cases, every possible precaution against fire were adopted, and every possible appliance invariably ready, and in good working order, for subduing the flames, should they break out, there is another reason why this encumbering of space should never have been tolerated.

The right of way ought to be as sternly claimed and preserved in a theatre as in any other locality. Woe to the lord of the manor whose natural proclivities to encroachment tempt him into endeavouring to debar his neighbours from a well-established right of way, even though it entitle them to pass almost under his dining-room windows. Let no Manchester cotton spinner, exemplifying in an original sense the oft-quoted response: "[Novus] Homo sum; Nihil humanum a me alienum puto"—imagine he can seize upon, as his own, and shut up, the path leading through a copse or field which forms a portion of the estate he has recently purchased, if long custom has consecrated that path public property. Even Royalty has ere this learnt, after a twenty years' struggle, that the right of way is something to which Englishmen stick as pertinaciously as barnacles cling to a ship's side. The portrait of the sturdy brewer through whose exertions Richmond Park was preserved for the Public still adorns the walls of many a sanded, old-fashioned inn-parlour on the banks of the Thames. It is, therefore, astonishing that theatre-goers should so long have foregone a right which not even an English sovereign could deny old John Lewis; and they are bound to feel thankful to the Lord Chamberlain for having espoused their cause against those who had virtually deprived them of it.

How truly was it observed by the great French fabulist:—

"On se voit d'un autre œil qu'on ne voit son prochain."

It never struck Managers that there was aught reprehensible in their barring the progress of their patrons to or from the seats which those patrons had hired, and for which they had duly paid. Yet Managers can declaim loudly and vehemently enough against the Gas or the Water Companies, or the Telegraph Authorities, or the Commissioners of Sewers, or the Board of Works, all of whom seem to exert their ingenuity in discovering how often, without causing an insurrection on the part of the inhabitants, they can impede the traffic of the Metropolis. It certainly is provoking to find the roadway continually and truculently ripped up by a legion of broad-shouldered navvies, armed with pick-axe and shovel; to see two parallel lines of black, mal-odorous earth, with a deep chasm between them, extending, as far as the eye can reach, down what is sometimes, and would be always if it were let alone, a busy thoroughfare, giving passage to countless vehicles; and to discover that the regulations issued by Col. Henderson for "setting down" and "taking up" cannot be executed within less than half-a-mile or a mile of the theatre to which they were intended by the gallant Colonel to apply. Yet Managers are scarcely the persons who should complain. What real difference in principle is there between blocking up a necessary gangway inside a theatre with additional chairs, and, by means of excavations, which might delight the eye of an antiquary at Nineveh, but certainly do not please the frequenters of a London street, obstructing the approaches to the theatre from without?

Again: I am not aware that Theatrical Managers are more ardent advocates than their fellow-men for the over-freighting of Citizen Steamers, or for jamming two passengers into a given space on the knife-board of a Waterloo or a Favourite omnibus, if the said space is large enough for only half that amount of humanity. Had things, however, been allowed to pursue their course unchecked, it might have been found necessary to license theatres, as well as the conveyances just mentioned, to accommodate a certain number of customers and no more. Fortunately, the Deus ex Machina appeared, not before his advent was needed, in the shape of the Lord Chamberlain. Let us hope that, after having issued his notice, his Lordship will take care that it is duly respected.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A MONUMENT is to be inaugurated on the 6th May, 1876, in the church of Santa Croce, Florence, in memory of Bartolomeo Cristofori, the inventor of the piano.

Verdi completed last month his sixty-second year. May he live and compose to his one hundred and twenty-fourth year. [His health herewith, in a bumper.—D. P.]

MARIE KREBS, the accomplished pianist whom English amateurs love so well, has returned to her native city of Dresden, where she is about to give a concert, the programme of which includes Sterndale Bennett's three sketches, The Lake, the Millstream and the Fountain. We should like to be there, especially for the Millstream.

THE following composers were born during the month of November: Vincenzo Bellini (on the 1st, 1801); Gaspare Spontini (on the 14th, 1774); Michele Carafa (on the 17th, 1787); Gaetano Donizetti (on the 29th, 1797). Felix Mendelssohn died on the fourth, 1847; Gioachino Rossini, (on the 13th, 1868); Cristophe Gluck, (on the 15th, 1787); and Franz Schubert, (on the 19th, 1828).

THE new operas produced in Italy since the 1st January up to the present date are twenty-nine in number. They comprise:—Colombo, first performed in the private theatre of the Countess Talon, at her villa near Bologna, Sig. Fava; Elena in Troja, Naples, Sig. d'Alessio; Il Pipistrello, Naples, Sig. Giosa; Gustavo Wasa, Milan, Sig. Marchetti; Amore e Vendetta, Regio, Sig. Marchio; Corinna, Naples, Sig. Rebora; Selvaggia, Venice, Sig. Schira; Dolores, Florence, Sig. d'Auterri-Manzocchi; Don Luigi di Toledo, Vercelli, Sig. Coriani; Le Figlie di Priamo, Naples, Sig. d'Alessio; Amore a suo Tempo, Bologna, Sig. Tossano; La Rosa del Cadore, Alexandria, Sig. Predaggi; Scomburga, Brescia, Sig. Pelligrini; Luigi XI., Florence, Sig. L. Fumigalli; Le tre Zie, Leghorn, Sig. Giacomelli; Il Ritorno del Coscritto, Sienna, Sig. Tolomei; Don Bizzarro e le sue Figlie, Naples, Sig. Mugnone; Le Rivale senza Amante, Naples, Sig. Greco; Una Burla, Bologna, Sig. Parisini; Isabella Orsini, Pavia, Sig. Isidore Rossi; La Fata, Naples, Sig. Miceli; Maria e Fernando, Naples, Sig. Ferruccio Ferrari; Benvenuto Cellini, Naples, Sig. d'Orsini; Giudetta, Naples, Sig. Scoria; Il Cacciatore, Milan, Sig. Canavasso; Un Matrimonio sotta la Republica, Milan, Sig. Podesta; I quattro Rustici, Florence, Sig. Moscuzza; Si e No, Naples, Sig. Panico; and La Vendetta d'un Foletto, Rome, the Brothers Mililotti.

A PERIODICAL CRY.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—According to the Guide Musical of the 28th ult., Carl Rosa's English opera speculation at the Princess's Theatre "is the first that has succeeded." Such an assertion might do for the Marines, or for strangers unacquainted with facts. Many other speculations of the kind have succeeded, in a similar manner, for a few weeks; and, doubtless, English opera would have been firmly established in London long ago, if English musicians had possessed that amour propre which makes opera performances succeed elsewhere. We have no lack of poets or musicians capable of producing operas equal, perhaps, to those of our neighbours; but there has been a lack of courage, owing to the profound respect that has always been shown for foreign productions, which has often proved the truth of the old adage, "Fancy may bolt bran and think it flour." Let Englishmen trust in their own strength, and once determine to have English opera (not a company to perform adaptations and court odious comparisons), then, and not till then, will Englishmen prove themselves to be equal to the task.

["Amour propre" is all moonshine. "Esprit de Corps" is everything. We have none of it. We want no more Bunns, or Fitzballs, Tom Cookes, or Rophino Lacys. The best man we have had among us for an age is Carl Rosa. May he go on and prosper. He has given us Balfe and Wallace, and one day will give us Macfarren and Sullivan; but that is no reason why he should not give us, also, Mozart, Cherubini, and Auber—Le Philtre for example. Heaven forfend!—D. PETERS.]

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.—The "English Night," at the Royal Italian Opera House, Covent Garden, attracted a large audience. The vocal artists were Miss José Sherrington and Mr Pearson; the instrumentalists, Mdme Norman-Neruda (violin) and Miss Muschamps (pianoforte). Among the instrumental morceaux which obtained the greatest success were G. A. Macfarren's overture, Chevy Chase, Sterndale Bennett's overture, The Naiades, Mr John Francis Barnett's descriptive piece, Lay of the Last Minstrel (composed for the Liverpool Festival of 1874)—and all capitally played by the orchestra, under the direction of Signor Arditi. The Barcarolle from Bennett's Fourth Concerto was given with delicacy and finish by Miss Muschamp. The vocal music obtained the usual amount of success, Miss José Sherrington being deservedly applauded and recalled after "Home, sweet home," and "Where the bee sucks" (the latter sung with characteristic archness by the fair artist); and the same compliment being paid to Mr Pearson after his two songs. The "Selection" was from Balfe's Satanella; the Quadrille, Coote's "The Promenade;" and the Galop, which brought the concert to a merry close, Mr F. Godfrey's "Good Night."

MISS EMILY MOTT, a young vocalist who is making steady progress in her profession, gave an evening concert at St James's Hall on Monday. Miss Mott was assisted by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Blanche Cole, Mr Lewis Thomas, and Mr Sims Reeves, Mr Sydney Smith (pianoforte), and the band of the Coldstream Guards, under the direction of Mr Fred. Godfrey. Miss Mott sang "Flowers of Frendship" (George Fox), "The Minstrel Boy," "Yes and No" (Louisa Gray), and took part with Madame Blanche Cole in the duet "As it fell upon a day;" on each occasion receiving hearty demonstrations of approval. Mr Sims Reeves gave Blumenthal's "Requital," responding to the encore by singing "Tom Bowling" and "The Bay of Biscay," which raised a perfect uproar in the hall. Mr Sydney Smith played in his best style, and his popular galop, "En route," was received with hearty demonstrations of approval. The general programme also contained other well known pieces, and their respective exponents were rewarded by the applause of the audience. The Coldstreams' band, in Mr Fred. Godfrey's "England" fantasia, and in the "Pas de Patineurs," from Glinka's Life for the Czaar (piccolo obbligato, Mr Nice), acquitted themselves admirably.

MR WALTER BACHE gave a recital of pianoforte music at St James's Hall, on Monday afternoon, assisted by Mrs Beesley, Herr Wilhelmj, and Miss Anna Williams. The programme included Bach's Fantasia in C minor, Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, Op. 111; Mendelssohn's Characteristic Pieces (Op 7), Nos. 4 and 7, and Chopin's Six Preludes, Op. 28, two studies by Liszt, Raff's chaconne for two pianos (Op. 150), and Liszt's transcription of David's "Ungarische." Mr Bache possesses undeniable facility, and his scale passages are remarkable for their crispness and evenness; the lighter style of composition, however, appears better suited to him than Beethoven's Op. 111.; hence the pianist shone most brilliantly in the charming morceaux of Mendelssohn, the eccentric and difficult studies by Liszt, and the exacting preludes of Chopin. Mr Bache's efforts were well appreciated and loudly applauded. In Raff's chaconne the bénéficiaire was associated with Mrs Beesley (a pupil of Dr Hans von Bülow), a pianist of no mean attainments. Its interpretation left nothing to be desired. Herr Wilhelmj played Bach's chaconne for violin solo in a style with which the public are familiar, and, in response to a demand for an encore, substituted his transcription of a nocturne by Chopin. Miss Anna Williams sang Pergolesi's "Tre giorni," and Schumann's "Schone Wiege." Mr Zerbini was the accompanist. The hall was well filled.

MUNICH.—It may be remembered that, some two years since, Herr Nachbaur suddenly left this city for fear of the cholera, then raging, and broke his engagement at the Theatre Royal. A warrant was even taken out for his arrest by the Intendant. That official, however, has, by express order of the King, again engaged the whilom fugitive, who has just made his reappearance on the stage here. It had been everywhere reported that, unless his "friendly gossip" (the King had acted as godfather to one of the tenor's sons), were present to support him, he would never dare to face the unfriendly reception and insults he had been led to expect from a part of the public. These apprehensions were not realised, though the King was not in the house, which was crowded from floor to ceiling. Herr Nachbaur sang very finely, and was rapturously recalled after every act. There were a few hisses at first, but they soon died away amid the nearly universal applause, and were not repeated. Thus the gap caused in the company by the panic-stricken Herr Nachbaur's flight, a gap which the Intendant has, for two years, in vain attempted to fill, has at last been stopped up by Herr Nachbaur himself.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Nov. 3, 1875.

The first of Mr Charles Hallé's eighteenth series of grand orchestral concerts was given on Thursday last; no element of success was wanting, and the season could not well have had a more brilliant beginning. The band, being justly renowned, is now, perhaps, finer than ever; and the return of M. Lavigne, whose absence during the last two or three years has been much regretted, is a very sensible gain. Signor Riseguri is another artist whose return is welcomed. This gentleman now shares with Mr Goodwin the leadership of the second violins. Mr Paquis, the horn player, who is suffering from serious illness, is an absentee, whose loss is serious; and of the retirement of Mr C. A. Seymour, who has for many years held an honourable and eminent position in the musical world here, I have already spoken. Mr Hallé's reference to Mr Seymour, in the programme of last Thursday, is so creditable to both gentlemen, and reflects also the general sentiment of the Manchester public towards Mr Seymour with so much accuracy, that I venture to ask you to insert it:—

"At the commencement of the eighteenth season I have to express my deep regret, which is shared by the whole orchestra, at the retirement of a gentleman upon whose valuable and most sympathetic co-operation it has been my pride to be allowed to rely since the institution of these concerts. Mr Seymour, the experienced and talented leader of the orchestra, who has honoured me with his friendship from the time of my arrival in Manchester, and whose name has been so intimately associated with mine in all my musical undertakings in this city, has, through failing health, been obliged to relinquish his post, a loss to the concerts which cannot be over estimated; and, as I am forbid to indulge the hope that Mr Seymour will ever be able to resume his accustomed place; I take this opportunity of discharging the pleasing duty of thus recording my high sense of gratitude for his past services, and for the ever-cheerful, untiring, and affectionate manner in which they have been tendered to me.

"CHARLES HALLÉ.

"October 23, 1875."

I sent you the programme of this concert last week, and need only say a few words about it now. Mdme Christine Nilsson was in splendid voice, and the vocal part of the programme was also ably supported by Mdlle Johanna Levier, Miss Alice Fairman, Mr Lloyd, and Signor Foli. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor was superbly played, and the same may be said of the Egmont overture and an overture by Lachner, played here for the first time. Mr Hallé's own performances were not the least delightful contributions to this concert, and his playing of one of Chopin's nocturnes was something to be remembered.

Lessons in humility should always be gratefully accepted, and I confess that I am always calm when I am reminded of the wholesome truth that we in the country are at best only provincials. And when I read the other day in the Musical World that an overture by Cusins, the performance of which in Manchester I had already told you about, was to be played at the Crystal Palace in the following week, for the first time in public, the obvious inference did not distress me. But, for the sake of my own credit as a chronicler, let me assure you, not only that I myself heard the overture to Love's Labour's Lost a few weeks since in the Manchester Concert Hall, as reported in your paper, but that I was equally truthful when, last season, I wrote to you about two separate performances, at Mr Hallé's concerts, of Volkman's overture to Richard the Third, announced to be played last Saturday at the Crystal Palace, "for the first time in England."

DUSSELDORF.—The Dortmund Committee had decided on having the best two of the compositions sent in for the Bismark Hymn publicly performed here in September, and on awarding the prize to the more satisfactory composition of the two. The preparations for carrying out this resolution were already in full swing, when the Dortmund Committee wanted to impose certain conditions as to the prices of admission, the sale of tickets, and other matters. Guided by their experience of former musical performances, the Düsseldorf Committee did not consider themselves justified in assenting to these conditions. The whole business has, in consequence, been brought to a dead lock, and it will be still some time before the public hears the Bismark Hymn.

THEODOR MULLER.

The Service for the Dead has just been read, at Brunswick, over an old man once belonging to a group of valued artists, whose great reputation extended far beyond the frontiers of Germany. Quietly and silently has the last of the old Quartet of the Brothers Müller been laid in the grave. In the days of our fathers and grandfathers, when Chamber Music, which, thanks to younger men, has received a fresh impulse, constituted the real core of musical culture in our native land, the four Brothers were among the most highly-esteemed members of the art world; and it was not till long afterwards that their Quartet, during many a decennium unsurpassed, was equalled, and, certainly, even excelled, by the Florentine and by the Joachim Quartets. Though, in accordance with the spirit of the age forty years since, there was a touch of homeliness about the way in which the Brothers read and rendered a composition, their bows poured forth, in the utmost purity, a clear, golden stream of classical masterpieces, and rarely have four other artists, seated at the quartet desks, worked with such wonderful unity of musical feeling, and, by the equality of their artistic capabilities, produced so thoroughly the impression that a single directing soul hovered over the instruments. The younger Brothers Müller—four sons of the first violinist in the old Quartet—who, some fifteen years ago, made an essay to tread in the footsteps of their relatives, could not come up to the latter in this equality of artistic aptitude, the first violinist, more especially, not being able to hold his own against the violoncellist (now, as we know, a member of the Joachim Quartet). The services of the first four Brothers Müller were secured for the Brunswick Opera in its palmy days, when a Pöck, a Schmezer, and a Mad. Fischer-Achten worked there together; Georg, as conductor; Gustav, as music-director; Carl (first violin), as leader; and Theodor, as solo-violoncello. By the deaths of Carl and Gustav, now nearly a quarter of a century ago, the Quartet lost its middle instrumentalists. The other two, however, attained to a venerable old age. The first violin has been mute some few years; the last survivor, Theodor, at the age of nearly eighty, is now called away from his post—and the members of the Old Quartet are once more united.—Berlin Echo.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In reference to the notice, in last week's Musical World, about the centenary commemoration, in Florence, of "Cristofori," who is credited with being the inventor of the pianoforte, I beg to mention that, in Germany, Christoph Gottlieb Schroeter is considered as having been the first to transform the harpsichord into the modern pianoforte. This was in 1717, when he invented the model, which afterwards was carried out by Silberman. There can be no dispute about the fact that Cristofori was the inventor of material improvements of the instrument; but, still, as these date only from the year 1718, I think there can be no doubt as to whom the honour belongs of having been first in the field. The admirable leading article on this subject, in the Daily Telegraph of October 25, points this out clearly enough. The following historical notices, which I am able to supply, may not be without interest:—Christoph Gottlieb Schroeter was born on the 10th of August, 1699, at Hohenstein, on the frontier of Bohemia, but he spent the greater part of his life at Nordhausen, in Prussia, where he died in November, 1782, while organist of the parish church. The house in which he lived, in Nordhausen, is provided with a tablet, on which his merits about the pianoforte are commemorated, and which tablet I have seen there myself.—I beg to remain, Sir, yours faithfully, CHARLES OBERTHÜR.

KAZAN.—The new Theatre was recently inaugurated with Glinka's opera of Life for the Czaar.

ROME.—The Teatro Rossini is to be opened for a short number of nights, when La Sonnambula will be performed with Signora Isidor, Signori Baragli and Graziosi.

CATANIA.—The new theatre is rapidly approaching completion. The sum of 250,000 francs has already been expended on it, but 150,000 more will be required before it can be opened.

BARCELONA.—The Teatro del Liceo was opened for the season with L'Africaine, the artists being Signore Urban, Cristino, Signori Tamagno, Mendioroz. Miller, and Rodoz. The second opera was to be Martha, with Signore Rubini, Machwitz, Signori Vidal, Miller, and Capriles.

LECTURE ON ELIJAH.

(From an Occasional Contributor.)

The lecture delivered at the Beethoven Rooms on the 27th ult., on the character of Elijah fully deserved the very attentive appreciation it received. Amateurs as well as professionals were equally unanimous in their expressions of satisfactory pleasure. Mr Henry Lesingham (by whom the lecture was delivered), through the distinctness of his elocution secured the correct understanding of every sentence. The novelty of the subject was sufficient to insure attentive consideration. To paint moral features, or qualities, by means of sound is rarely attempted. The great composers, Bach, Handel, and Haydn, among others, seem never to have conceived the idea; but in this lecture it is suggested by inference, if not asserted, that Mendelssohn, when he wrote Elijah, aimed at nothing short of a musical portrait. The ear, not having been cultivated like the eye, is the reason assigned that portraits of the moral features by means of sound are not so common and successful as they are by means of colour. If, it is said, the characteristics of a man's moral nature may be judged of, and ascertained through, the art of the painter, why should not they in like manner be apparent through the art of the musician? The various high qualities of Elijah, as they are pointed out to us in Holy Scripture, such as his dignity, his zeal, his fervour among others, are musically expressed by Mendelssohn with a power which makes this portrait widely different from any attempt at portraiture by any composer before his time. This assertion is strengthened by an allusion to Haydn's Creation. Here there is no difference between the characters of Adam and Eve; the strains of melody pertaining to the two are almost identical. A distinction, too, is drawn between characteristic music and music expressive of the more important qualities of a particular man's nature. The song "O ruddier than the cherry" is characteristic of Polyphemus, but it would have equally well suited any other giant. The hard, sepulchral, unmelodic phrases which the Statue in Don Giovanni sings, are applicable to that figure of stone, or to any other such figure. But, in these instances only, the one common characteristic is pictured: while, in the case of the musical portrait, all the moral features must be imitated. Enough has been said here to give a notion of the general scope of the lecture; but anything like a thoroughly satisfactory abstract of the contents of the paper read by Mr Lesingham will not be attempted. Every position advanced has an illustration in the music of the oratorio; so that there is furnished to us matter for reflection. But whether the main proposition, that sound, like colour, should be able to paint moral characteristics, may be asserted fearlessly will depend in a measure upon what use is made of the suggestion. That Mendelssohn made a great step in advance of any previous attempt is sufficiently shown in this lecture. It remains to be seen whether other musicians will follow the composer of St Paul and Elijah, in his seemingly apparent effort to employ music for a purpose which, till his day, had been disregarded. Speaking in general terms, the lecture was an excellent criticism upon the musical character of the Prophet, viewed from the standpoint taken by the writer; and, if its acceptance by a discriminating audience be worth anything, it must be admitted that considerable sympathy was evoked.

The illustrations, sung with great effect by Mr Fred. Penna, included "Lord God of Abraham" and "It is enough," besides "O God have mercy," from St Paul, which formed part of the introduction. The accompaniments were played by Sir Julius Benedict, which is equivalent to the assertion that they were perfect.

It only remains to add that the writer of the lecture was Mr Fred. Penna. A. B.

AVIGNON.—The theatre has been completely destroyed by fire.

ROVERETO.—A new opera, Merlino da Patone, by Sig. Calderoni, has been well received here.

PARMA.—La Stella delle Alpi,, a new opera by a young composer, Sig. Giovanni Bolzoni, has been successfully produced.

BUENOS AYRES.—Verdi's Requiem was to be given here with Signore Mariani, Biancolini, Signori Bolis and Barberat.

HANOVER.—Herr Hermann Götz's comic opera, Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung, is to be produced at the Theatre Royal almost directly.

THE FIRST PERFORMANCE OF IL BARBIERE AT ROME, IN 1816.

The incidents attending the first performance of Rossini's Barbiere, at Rome, have been described in a thousand different ways. Annexed are two letters of authentic documentary evidence, calculated to throw a new light upon the subject. Wishing to know the history of the case, a friend of Rossini's addressed him as below:—

"Paris, 20th March, 1860.

"My dear Rossini,—As you may easily imagine, the promise you were kind enough to make me last Sunday is not one to be forgotten, and I again beg you will crown all my wishes by tracing in your own hand on the preceding page, my cherished score of the Barbiere, a little account of when that masterpiece was conceived by you; of the circumstances accompanying its conception; of how it was received on the first night; of where it was first played; of the number of days in which it was composed, etc. I say nothing of the duration of its glory; we already know sufficient to affirm that to speak on that point will fall to the lot of future ages.

"If I possessed such an historical account, in addition to the masterpiece for which I am indebted to your highly-valued friendship, you would once more have realised every wish of the most affectionate and the most devoted of your admirers. SCITIVAUX."

After the lapse of a month, Rossini replied by the following interesting and curious letter:—

"My very dear Scitivaux,—As you are familiar with my native tongue, allow me to use it to give you the historical account you desire of my Barbiere di Siviglia.

"I was summoned to Rome in 1815, to compose for the Teatro Valle the opera of Torvaldo e Dorlisca, which was very successful. My interpreters were Galli, Donzelli, and Remorini, who possessed the finest voices I ever heard. The Duke Cesarini, the proprietor of the Teatro Argentina, and the manager during the carnival season, was doing very wretchedly. He proposed, therefore, that I should write him (in a hurry) an opera for the close of the said season. I consented; and, in conjunction with Sterbini, a Secretary in the Treasury and a poet, commenced the task of finding a subject for a libretto which I might put to music. Our choice fell upon Il Barbiere. I set to work, and in thirteen days my task was completed. I had as interpreters Garcia, Zamboni, and Signora Giorgi Righetti, all three great singers. I wrote a letter to Paesiello, stating that I had not wished to enter the lists against him, as I felt my inferiority, but that I had simply desired to treat a subject which took my fancy, avoiding as much as possible the situations in his libretto. Having taken this step, I believed I was secure from the criticisms of his friends and of his legitimate admirers. I made a mistake. On the production of my opera, these persons fell like wild beasts on the beardless young composer, and the first performance was most stormy. I was not, however, put out, but, while the audience were hissing, applauded my executants. When the tempest had passed, on the second night, my Barbiere, who had an excellent razor (Beaumarchais), shaved the Romans' beards so well that I was carried in triumph (theatrical phrase).

"Your wish is now fulfilled, my dear friend. Be happy, and believe me always, yours affectionately, G. ROSSINI.

"Paris, 28th April, 1860."

Cease thy sorrow,
For to-morrow
Happiness may bring;
With to-day
May pass away
Grief and suffering;
Let not the cloud
All bliss enshroud,
The sun will shine again.
Though long the night,
Joy and delight
Will come—be patient, then.
Though keen the blast,
'Twill soon be past,
All sorrows have an end;
Spring-time will come,
Fresh flowers will bloom,
And sweetest influence lend.
Bid care depart,
Let not thy heart
Beneath the smart
Of sorrows thus bow down:
The darkest night
By morning's light
Is put to flight,
And joy doth all things crown.
So—when despair
And anxious care
Appear to bar thy way,
Uplift thine eye,
And earnestly
Unto thy Father pray,
That He may give Grace to relieve
Thy soul from grief and woe:
So shalt thou find,
With thankful mind,
All sorrows quickly go.

WAIFS.

Madame Ristori has finally determined to visit Calcutta.

Madame Balfe has left town for Biarritz, on a visit to her son-in-law, the Duke de Frias.

Six performances of Aida at the Teatro Communale, Trieste, recently brought in 16,000 francs.

Miss Ellen C. Clayton, authoress of Queens of Song, will shortly publish a book on British Female Artists.

The death, at Windsor, of Mr Robert Barnett, the pianist, is announced. The funeral took place yesterday.

Sir Aubrey de Vere has a new historical drama in the press. He is also bringing out a new edition of his poems.

The Abbate Franz Liszt's oratorio of St Elizabeth will be performed at Mr Walter Bache's annual concert in February next.

Mad. Annie Essipoff has arrived in London, and is to play at the first Monday Popular concert, the day after to-morrow.

The oratorio on which Mr Macfarren is engaged will, says the Birmingham Mail, in all probability be produced at the Birmingham Musical Festival.

The Emperor Wilhelm left 1000 francs to be distributed among the box-keepers and other persons employed in a non-artistic capacity at the Scala, Milan.

The receipts of the gala performance at the Scala, Milan, in honour of the Emperor Wilhelm, amounted to 45,000 francs, or about £1,800 English money.

The American "Jubilee Singers" attended a meeting of children last week in the Drill Hall, Edinburgh, which was filled by nearly 4,000 teachers and scholars.

Sig Tito di Gio. Ricordi, the eminent music publisher of Milan, has purchased Sig. Ponchielli's Cantata in honour of Donizetti, recently performed at Bergamo.

It is said that a Pennsylvania tramp recently rejected a pair of cast-off trousers offered to him because they had no boot-straps. He was a beggar on horseback, and didn't care who knew it.

The jail of an American town is, says a local print, comparatively speaking, so empty since the close of court that a passing waggon makes the remaining prisoners rattle like pills in a pill-box.

According to the Evènement, an enthusiastic English admirer of Sig. Rossi has sent that gentleman a magnificent edition of Shakspere's works in twelve volumes. The books are enclosed in a splendid case.

Sig. Sivori has been stopping some time at Genoa. It is said that he has been invited to play at a series of concerts to be given in Philadelphia, during the approaching Grand Exhibition, but has declined the invitation.

Sig. Panofka has announced his intention of opening a course of musical instruction for four young Italians endowed with musical talent but without means to pay for masters. He will devote two hours a day to the task.

A very pretty song "Beauty sleeps"—founded upon Walter Scott's famous serenade, "Love wakes and weeps"—is now being sung at the Criterion Theatre by Mr Fisher. The music is from the pen of Mr Charles Braham.

Mr Haynes, of Malvern, is rehearsing, with his motet and madrigal choir, the oratorio of Judas Maccabæus. The Malvern News augurs a successful season, nearly 50 persons already having sent in their names as members.

A young and beautiful New Jersey girl, who was falsely accused of theft and acquitted on instructions from the judge, sprang on the bench and gave his honour a resounding kiss "for his mother." She was not fined for contempt.

M. Alma Tadema claims, it is stated, £8,000 damages for injury to his articles of vertu sustained by the explosion in the canal in Regent's Park last year. Mr Hepworth Dixon's claim has been paid, but M. Tadema's will be contested.

A hope has been expressed that the course of private music and singing lessons for ladies to be given at the Alexandra Palace by Sir Julius Benedict may ultimetely develop into a completely organised School of Art, Science, and Literature.

Mad. Clara Schumann will this winter resume her professional tours, having completely recovered the use of her arm, the state of which has, for some time past, prevented her from playing. She will first appear at Düsseldorf and Bonn.

Clytie, a drama by Joseph Hatton, adapted from his novel of the same name, will be produced at the Amphitheatre, Liverpool, on the 29th November. Mr John Coleman, of the Leeds circuit, will superintend the production. The play is accepted in London.

A national concert, under the patronage of the Duke of Westminster, Viscount Sandon, Sir Watkin W. Wynn, and other members of Parliament, is to be given in St George's Hall, Liverpool, on the 10th of November, in aid of the University College of Wales.

A new advertising trick has been invented in San Francisco, where a mock encounter between Prof. Hermann and an irate old gentleman in his audience causes quite a sensation. The newspapers report the affair as innocently as if that sort of work were not worth a dollar per line.

Mr W. W. Robertson, the managing director of the Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society, and Mr A. Bedborough, the architect, have left London for Paris to collect pictures, statues, articles of vertù, and to purchase fountains for the Royal Aquarium.

"Madame Anna Bishop's first concert in the Mutual Hall"—says the Cape Town Daily News—"was well attended. The programme displayed this great singer's varied powers in grand opera, ballad, &c. We have never seen in Cape Town a more enthusiastic audience. Everything was re-demanded, and in most instances Madame Bishop complied with the desire. It would be difficult to single out any for especial mention, all being rendered in a style simply superb. Madame Bishop's voice is a soprano of pure tone and great power. No such singer has ever before been heard in South Africa."

The third ballot for Fellows in the Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden was held on the 1st inst. Eight hundred and forty-two ladies and gentlemen came up for election, of whom six hundred and twenty were duly elected, amongst whem were included a large number of the artistic, scientific, and fashionable world. After the 1st December the entrance fee, we understand, will be raised from five to eight guineas. The Executive have secured a large site for a skating rink. The first tank was filled with water on the 1st inst., and fish may be seen disporting themselves therein.

THREE CHOIRS FESTIVALS.—An influential meeting of the standing committee of the Hereford Festival of the Three Choirs (Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford) has been held at Hereford, at which the President (Lord Bateman), the Chairman (J. H. Arkwright), and several of the most influential gentlemen of the country attended, to consider what steps should be taken in promotion of the Festival of 1876, when it will be the turn of Hereford to hold the meeting of the three choirs. The proceedings were most satisfactory. It was unanimously resolved to hold a festival, as usual, in the autumn, of the good old popular character; and the preliminary step to that end was taken, the committee agreeing upon a formal application to the Dean and Chapter of Hereford for the use of the cathedral for the oratorios, as usual.—Malvern News.

Sir Michael Costa is not the only musical composer who has received honours from the hand of English Royalty. Mr Arthur Sullivan is a great favourite in the happy family of "the Edinburghs." He hangs in his studio a memento of the Duchess's kindly feeling for him. It is not a very elegant article—only a rough and ready "butterfly catcher;" but it is highly prized, for the Royal and Imperial Princess made it herself. It came into Mr Sullivan's possession in this wise. He formed one of a party of moth-hunters down at Ashwell Park. He went out with the intention of being a mere spectator. The Duchess noticed his empty hands. She challenged him. "I have no net," Mr Sullivan pleaded. Bidding the party wait, she returned in-doors, improvised a net with her own fingers, and presented it to the English maestro. If Arthur Sullivan ever becomes great, the net will be historic.

During a speech, some time since, a prominent member of the Common Council of Boston, U.S., made the sage remark that a wise man changes his mind often, but a fool never, and in the next breath exclaimed: "I have not changed my mind"—and then he wanted to know what the other members were laughing at.

The Duke of Edinburgh has consented to lay the first stone of Mr Mapleson's New Grand National Opera House. The ceremony will take place at an early day, the whole substructure of the new building being now finished It is stated that there is no reason whatever to doubt that the National Opera House will open on the day originally named—the 2nd of next May.

We take the following tribute to Messrs Harrison's enterprise from the Birmingham Morning News:—

"The first for the present season of Messrs Harrison's Popular Subscription Concerts was given at the Town Hall. We remember but few occasions when commercial success so complete has been achieved. The room was crowded almost to overflowing, and seats in parts usually appropriated to the one shilling multitude were let at the highest reserved prices. The secret of this extraordinary success is a puzzle to many. We imagine it may be discovered in the care taken by our enterprising townsmen in providing for the pleasure and comfort of their patrons. It would lead to a long discussion were we to enter upon a consideration of the merits (in an artistic sense) of a performance of new or hackneyed Italian, German, and English songs and ballads. According to taste, we may or may not quarrel with the style of the music; but, the kind approved, we can find little or no fault with the quality of a programme selected from the works of Schubert, Chopin, Gounod, Halévy, Mendelssohn, Costa, Brahms, Wallace, Sullivan, and other masters of a similar class; nor can the expositions generally of the items chosen be unsatisfactory when they are undertaken by artists such as Madame Christine Nilsson, Mdlle Levier, Miss Alice Fairman, Mr Edward Lloyd, Signor Foli, Mr Kuhe, and Mr F. H. Cowen, who constituted the company for Messrs Harrison's inaugural evening."

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"Two charming songs, which contrasted very favourably with the usual quality of pieces chosen by prime donne for the programmes of miscellaneous concerts, were sung by Mdme Christine Nilsson at Mr Kuhe's concert, at St James's Hall. They are by the same hand which wrote those beautiful settings of Shelley's poems, which we have frequently heard at the Monday Popular Concerts and elsewhere. The first song is entitled, 'Sweet Village Bells,' and the poem is by the late Mr Desmond Ryan; the second, 'I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden,' is a setting of Shelley's poem."—Saturday Programme.

"THE MAIDEN'S TEAR."

Composed by LILLIE ALBRECHT.
Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, Regent Street, W.

"Miss Albrecht shows herself as clever a composer as she is a skilful performer, her Second Rêverie being a well designed, and excellently wrought-out Morceau de Salon, consisting of an introduction, melody, and variations. Considerable knowledge of the technicalities of the instrument is displayed in the writing, and the whole forms a most brilliant and effective solo. For scholastic purposes, as well as for public performances, the 'Maiden's Tear' will be found of great service."—Sunday Times, January 10th, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht, Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, is a good and useful teaching piece, calculated only to justify its title in the case of the union of two such elements as incompetency in the pupil and irritation on the part of the master."—Morning Post, February 3rd, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. Brilliant and full of feeling, this Rêverie may take its rank with the best of Mr Sidney Smith's compositions."—Young Englishwoman, May, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. A carefully conceived and well studied composition; the composer is evidently a zealous student, and she has apparently much natural ability."—Hornet, April 2nd, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht. After the style of Brinley Richards, this drawing-room piece is brilliant without being difficult, and shows both talent and knowledge of the laws of musical composition on the part of the composer, who is, we believe, a very young lady."—The Drawing Room Gazette, June 15th, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. This charming piece evinces in its style throughout no small share of original talent, as well as sparkling and artistic cultivation, it being full of delicate and plaintive feeling. We have no doubt that it will be very popular, both in the concert-room and saloon."—Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, May, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Sigh' and 'The Maiden's Tear,' two reveries for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. These are both from the pen of a highly talented and proficient pianiste, and are of considerable merit. The first is a pretty little exercise, and the fingering is excellent; the second is far prettier, and as a morceau de salon has exceptional merit, whilst at the same time it is unconventional."—Public Opinion.

TIETJENS AND THE NEW YORK PRESS.

(From "Concordia.")

"Nym Crinkle," writing about Mdlle Tietjens in the New York World of October 17, said bluntly, "The concerts broke down at the end of the first week," and added, "I will tell you why. Because she (Mdlle Tietjens) is an artist and not an adventuress." As far as can be distinguished amid hubbub and confusion, a major and two minor causes led to this result. Taking the latter first, we are told to see one in the fact that Mr Strakosch relied upon the greatness of his artist, and did not think it worth while to bolster her up with humbug. Mdlle Tietjens "came to America unworked, unpuffed, unanecdoted. Some of Mr Mapleson's press friends in London did endeavour to supply an advance biography.* But the subject was too large to handle. * * The lyric record defied the hasty pen." We are asked to believe that this abstention from management dodges was a mistake. Mr Strakosch should have arranged to have Mdlle Tietjens' shawl torn into relic-pieces the moment she landed, and hired men to draw her carriage in triumph up Broadway. In that case, the World thinks, "we should have seen the maddened ushers cutting themselves with knives when she sang 'With verdure clad;' the genteel ladies throwing up their handkerchiefs and tearing their hair, as they hastened to do when Nilsson sang 'Angels ever bright and fair' with French variations, and the shopkeepers standing on their seats to hurrah, as they were proud to do over Rubinstein's diminuendo in the Ruins of Athens." This severe reflection upon the New York public is, however, mildness itself compared with that contained in the second of the alleged minor causes of failure. The public, it appears, were absolutely incapable of appreciating the genius and achievements of the artist who had come among them. "I don't think," writes the critic of the World, "I ever saw an American audience evince so little judgment and good taste as at the first and second of Mdlle Tietjens' concerts. * * * The 'large and brilliant assemblages,' as they were called, were unmistakably disappointed at the simple superiority of the singer's art. * * * The 'Last rose of summer' was the first chirrup that touched them, and 'L'Ardita' alone twanged the common chords of their humanity." Here, then, if the evidence quoted may be accepted—and we could bring forward a good deal of corroborative proof—was a great artist introduced to a frivolous public, and left to work upon them without the prestige arising from the showman's dodges. Mr Strakosch should have known better. He has had experience enough of concert-goers across the Atlantic to put him on his guard against undue confidence in even such powers as those of Mdlle Tietjens, as well as against underrating the value of humbug.

But a more formidable reason than either managerial presumption or public incapacity is spoken of as connected with this matter. When the New York journals appeared the morning after Mdlle Tietjens' début, it was found that some of the most influential treated her with disparagement. "There were all sorts of allusions to her age, her size, her worn voice. Some of them rudely unkind; all of them grossly unjust." At the head of the detractors stood the formidable Herald—which is chargeable with inconsistency as well, seeing that in one notice it styled Mdlle Tietjens "magnificent," and in the next, a "disappointment." It was easy, of course, for papers more enlightened to be sarcastic at the cost of the malcontents. Thus the Sunday Mercury declared that Mr Strakosch had provided the "dailies" with "a grand subject for a sort of newspaper cannibalism," and went on to pour scorn upon the big critics:—"There is, it is true, in so much chaff a couple of literary grains of wheat, but it has become patent that the majority of pretenders who scribble about music are merely lyric scavengers who make fault-finding the end and aim of their writings, unless convinced otherwise in advance, when—no matter what may be the subject or occasion—the puffing machine is set in active motion." Remarks such as these were well meant, and it was legitimate warfare to show up the "scavengers" for writing learnedly about Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante, when they had actually heard a part of the G minor concerto. But nothing could neutralise the influence of the Herald and its associates. The earth contains so many millions of people, "mostly fools," as Carlyle observes, and the mind, or what passes as such, of a fool is hard to disabuse. The question arises now as to the motive of conduct which naturally distressed Mdlle Titiens, and drew from her an offer to annul the engagement and return to England at once. An answer to this question is easy:—The critics had their cue to force Strakosch and his prima donna into opera. Let us say here, that the desire for opera was perfectly intelligible, and one with which we who know the transcendent merit of Mdlle Tietjens on the lyric stage can sympathise. [Does not our excellent contemporary see that all this is done under the influence of Mr Strakosch himself? If not, let him peruse the "Book of Barnum," where the author of the "Moon Hoax" is shown up.—A. S. SILENT.]

But nobody has a right to do evil that good may come, nor, as in this special case, to compass the ruin of Mr Strakosch's concert scheme that he might be compelled to open a theatre. This, however, is the charge, distinctly brought against the Herald by some of its contemporaries. Here is an extract in proof:—"Since the first night that the great singer appeared at Steinway Hall, the Herald has unceasingly, instead of criticising the performances, been urging how much greater the prima donna would be in opera. Editorials have almost daily appeared in the same strain. Many of the stockholders of the Academy of Music are Mr Bennett's most intimate friends, and they have been influencing him strongly to urge Italian opera in his paper, because they suppose it must be given at the Academy of Music, and then the two hundred would be enabled to hear it for nothing. * * There can be no doubt that the Herald articles, imitated as they have been by other papers, have greatly damaged the Tietjens business. The public, in the hope of opera, stood off, and have not patronised the concerts as they should have been patronised." The matter, in point of fact, became so serious that Mr Strakosch wrote to the Herald editor, pointing out the almost certain pecuniary failure of any attempt at Italian Opera in New York, and citing many previous examples of such disaster. "Italian Opera is no real want here," urged the impressario, adding, "Seemingly there has been a pre-conceived determination in your criticism to force upon me in all kindness a business which I do not intend going into, and which I consider ruinous." Nevertheless, Mr Strakosch* made a proposition—Let the Herald and its sympathisers open a subscription for opera, and, if the result prove that the thing is really wanted, he pledges himself to bring over the principal artists of Mr Mapleson's troupe before the New Year. To this letter the Herald replied from its own point of view, admitting the difficulties in the way of opera; but urging, truly enough, that Mdlle Tietjens is, before all, a dramatic singer, and it is in that capacity that they desire to hear her. "This being the fact, why should we seek to conceal it? Indeed, it could not be hidden, for who does not know that the Tietjens who sings a few beautiful melodies in Steinway Hall is not the Tietjens who, we are told, swept the stage in the pomp of tragedy, and poured from 'the deep throat of sad Melpomene' Fidelio's constant love or Norma's passionate wrath." Mr Strakosch's suggestion the Herald treated as a joke, and could only acquit him of incredible innocence by complimenting him for unequalled irony. "He argues his right to conduct his own business, and then invites us to manage it for him. We decline the honour, which it would be presumption to accept." At this point matters stood, and now let us note the general confusion. The Herald is charged with working for its proprietor's friends; the daily critics are charged with injustice and ignorance; the manager is charged with culpable neglect; the artist is charged with the crimes of age, size, and a worn voice; and the public are accused of frivolity and want of taste. Truly a "free fight," needing nothing to complete it. But if anybody see in it room for another element of strife, we have the thing at hand. The Arcadian prints a "Farce in one act," which shows Mr Strakosch himself raising the clamour for opera, by prompting reporters, receiving "minions" as a deputation from the public, and bribing the Herald with double

* We have seen two "advanced biographies" (if such they may be termed)—the one cited as proceeding from the "London Daily Times," the other from the Pall Mall Gazette—not one word of which ever appeared either in the Times or the Pall Mall.—ED. M. W.

* Innocent Mr Strakosch!

terms for advertisements. Here is confusion worse confounded, and we give up the hopeless task of unravelment.

[How now? Have we hit the nail on the head?—A.S.S.]

In the midst of all this let Mdlle Tietjens find comfort through believing that her faithful English friends will be glad to welcome her back, safe and sound—the sooner the better.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

With the successful example of the Crystal Palace before them, the managers of the Muswell Hill enterprise could hardly do other than establish concerts akin to those which, under Mr Manns' direction, have attained almost world-wide fame. The Alexandra Palace, therefore, has its musical Saturdays, and hopes to gather together, in the far north of London, an audience as numerous and, in time, as cultured as that which assembles weekly in the far south. Everybody must desire a happy issue for the venture. There is room enough, in good sooth, for this new worker, and we would fain believe that there is also a harvest of success to be reaped by skilful and persevering hands. The prospectus of the first season, which began on Saturday week, is particularly attractive, with regard to new and unfamiliar works. This, in point of fact, is its speciality. Mr Weist Hill seems to have taken a very comprehensive view of his duties as a caterer, and every programme will be rich in novelty, even if no more than half the promised works are brought out. On one point the Alexandra Palace scheme differs from that of Sydenham—it devotes a part of each concert to music of "a miscellaneous description." The difference, however, is more apparent than real. Even Mr Manns finds it necessary to take the "popular" element into account—witness the vocal music which so often wearies his connoisseur patrons. But Mr Weist Hill proposes to give material of this kind, and its orchestral counterpart, during the second half of each concert, when only those who care to hear it need keep their places. The plan has advantages above and beyond the commercially important one of appealing to a large public, and will be regarded with general favour, seeing that the matter has to be dealt with somehow.

"New brooms" not only "sweep clean," as saith the proverb, but they sometimes operate in dark and neglected corners, to prove their utility with more conspicuousness. The practice is one to be encouraged, especially when it makes partial atonement for the errors of bygone generations, performs an act of justice to a great name, and gives to living art another masterpiece. These be "prave 'ords"—and the reader may ask, with pardonable incredulity, when and where, of late, anything so striking has been done. The answer is easy—at the Alexandra Palace, on Saturday last, the deed performed being the revival of Handel's Esther. It was officially announced that this work would be produced on the occasion for the first time since 1757, the date of its last hearing, during the life of the illustrious composer. This may not be strictly correct, because we have always had amongst us societies whose laudable curiosity induced them to explore fields of art across which the beaten path did not run. These institutions, we can hardly doubt, have not forgotten a work which, though neglected, stands out conspicuous in the record of Handel's life. The overture has ever occupied the place of a favourite, and the great provincial festivals used years ago to dip now and then into the body of the oratorio. But there is reason to believe that no public performance on an adequate scale intervened between the day when Esther was given, in 1757, and Saturday last. The interval is a wide one, measured by the life of man; but art is long, and can see with complacency the flux of time. It can afford to wait; and to all in that happy position everything comes, even justice, which, proverbially, has leaden feet. The story of Esther scarcely needs telling here, because it is familiar to everybody with a smattering of knowledge about England's best-loved musician. Enough if we call to the amateur's memory how the oratorio was written for the Duke of Chandos, in 1720, when Handel filled the post of chapelmaster in the household of that gorgeous peer; how, after being twice performed at Cannons, it was laid aside for twelve years, and only revived at a private performance, got up by Mr Bernard Gates, master of the Chapel Royal boys; how the interest it then excited led to a public hearing; and how Handel was thus induced to give his attention to oratorio as a means of wealth and fame. The story, in outline, is soon told; but it would not be easy to exhaust the significance of Esther, as the first English oratorio, or of those seemingly trivial events which, working through it, launched the composer on a career that secured for his memory a "Broad approach of fame,

And ever-ringing avenues of song."

So regarded, the oratorio appeals to us as does the tiny source of some vast river, or the thought in a single human brain which, according to Emerson, is the parent of every revolution. The manuscript of Esther, as it lay dust-covered on the shelf at Cannons, contained not only all the actualities of oratorio as we are now conscious of them, but all the possibilities which, in the future, may become real. To what the neglected score has led we know; it was like the last offshoot of a decayed stock—for oratorio in Italy was then fast dying out—taken to root and flourish in another and more vigorous soil. Upon its existence, as far as can now be seen, depended the future of a grand form of art. What would have been the result had a servant at Cannons lit the Duke's library fire with the precious paper before Mr Bernard Gates obtained a duplicate? May we fancy that that which is now known as oratorio would have no existence? Hardly, perhaps, dare we go so far, but it is certain that nobody could then have shown Handel the possibilities of oratorio in England, and it is probable that he would have written his dearly-loved operas to the end of the chapter. Imagine English sacred music without The Messiah, Israel, and Judas,—nay, imagine England itself without The Messiah alone! To do so is to see in the mind's eye a somewhat different country, or there is nothing in the exercise of an abiding, all-pervading, and powerful influence.

The music of Esther is a theme so ample and tempting that we scarcely dare venture upon its discussion within the compass of a notice like this. To exhaust the topic, we should have not only to consider the work per se, but from a comparative stand-point, marking how and in what measure it shows the influence of Italian art upon the solid basis of German thought, and how and in what degree it contrasts or harmonises with the master's matured style. Upon these points much might be said which now can only be indicated. A first thought connected with the work has reference to its non-dramatic character. The form of the Italian sacred play is preserved by a division into acts and scenes, but the libretto is so constructed as to prove clearly enough that the idea of a dramatic performance was not in the writer's mind. Moreover, the original Esther was even less adapted for stage business than the second and enlarged form of the work produced, without theatrical accessories, in 1732. In this there is no reason to imagine that Handel was actuated by deference to English notions. Italy herself at that time had abandoned the sacred drama, and her oratorios were performed, when produced at all, with nothing save music and poetry to recommend them. But the influence of Italian art upon Esther takes a wider range than the form of telling the story. We see it especially in the character of the solos, which are unusually numerous, after the fashion of the model Handel adopted. The grace and suavity, tunefulness, and balance of phrase, that characterise, inter alia, "Dread not, righteous Queen," "Tears assist me," and "O beauteous Queen, unclose those eyes," mark their origin with a distinctness doubly apparent when a contrast is made with the more rugged eloquence of contemporary German art as illustrated by Bach. But, while this is the case, it is also true that we see Handel alone in the dramatic fitness which welds each air firmly into the perfect whole of the work. There is not a song in Esther, so regarded, that fails to present a study of characterisation and truthful expression. The choruses are fewer and less developed, with two exceptions, than those of later works, but all of them bear the stamp of the master's genius. What a mingling of grandeur and pathos have we in "Ye sons of Israel, mourn!" and how interesting it is to recognise this early demonstration of the fact that the Saxon master, while able to lead a nation's praises, could also embody, in accents fit to "storm the seat of mercy," a nation's cry of lamentation. What a wealth of power, moreover, is there in the triumphant song of the Israelites, "He comes to end our woes," and how the hammer of this musical Thor descends on the words "Earth, tremble," till it seems as though the behest were literally obeyed. But in the final chorus, "The Lord our enemy hath slain"—an extended scena introducing soli again and again—Handel may almost be held to surpass himself. It is a magnificent effort at fullest stretch of power, Pelion rising upon Ossa till the heavens are touched, and there seems no possibility of ascending higher. If only for this chorus, the revival of Esther deserves a welcome. But the oratorio is full of beauty, and now, with its sounds still vibrating, we look back over the gulf of a hundred and eighteen years with pity for the generations that neglected it.

Passing the questions involved in the conflicting editions of the work, and merely saying that the version used on Saturday was that of the English "Handel Society," edited by the late Charles Lucas, we come to the performance, which drew to Muswell Hill an audience, not only large, but representatives of all classes in the musical world. Here let us promptly recognise the merit generally displayed, from Mr Weist Hill, who worked with heart and soul as well as skill, down to the humblest chorister. Great pains must have been taken, and many rehearsals held, before music so unfamiliar could have been so thoroughly grasped. But the end was worth the means, thanks to which Esther made a fitting début. The soloists were Madame Nouver, Miss Enriquez, Mr Vernon Rigby, Mr Howells, and Mr Wadmore—all English artists (as was fitting), although the first-named lady chooses to assume the disguise of a foreigner. Madame Nouver, who is new to London concert-rooms, has a fine and powerful soprano voice, as well as considerable aptitude for her profession. She needs further teaching, however, especially in recitative, the proper signification and manner of which do not seem to have been explained to her. Miss Enriquez sang capitally "O Jordan, sacred tide," and the very dramatic invocation which opens the third act; while Mr Howells, a student, we believe, at the Royal Academy of Music, pleased by his agreeable voice and unobtrusive rendering of the second tenor music. Mr Vernon Rigby, strictly accurate as usual, sang the airs of Ahasuerus and Mordecai excellently, making with them the greater effect because they are well suited to his voice and style. Praise must also be given to this gentleman for his recitatives, which were uniformly declaimed with intelligence and dramatic purpose. Mr Wadmore rendered the music of Haman in a manner which showed the possession of more than a good voice, and the encore given to his recitative, "Turn not, O Queen," was as deserved as it was unexpected. The band and chorus, as already intimated, were thoroughly equal to their work, and Mr Weist Hill won hearty commendation by the judicious manner of his conducting. That Esther had a warm reception may be readily supposed. Four numbers were repeated, and at the end long and loud applause testified general satisfaction. We have only to say further, that the additions to Handel's meagre score were made by Mr Halberstadt in the true spirit of an artist, and with touches here and there of striking beauty. Not a note of the original was altered, while the additions made—a liberal allowance of trombone excepted—were marked by most excellent judgment.

ROME.

(From a Correspondent.)

In consequence of the refusal of the Municipality to allow a grant of more than a hundred thousand francs for the Teatro Apollo, no one has come forward as a candidate for the vacant managerial throne. The upshot will most probably be, as it was in 1874, that the Municipality will decide at the last moment, when most artists of repute have already been engaged, on opening the theatre after all, and, instead of a hundred thousand, be under the obligation of paying two hundred thousand francs, and perhaps more, for a second or third rate company.—The Teatro Argentina has been opened with Un Ballo in Maschera, and Sig. Rota's ballet of Fornaretto. The next opera will be Verdi's Macbeth, and then comes Sig. Sangiorgi's new opera, Diana.—The Teatro Rossini has been opened with La Sonnambula, the part of the heroine by Signora Rosa Isidor.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

At the fifth concert, on Saturday, Mr Sims Reeves appeared, and the music-room was literally crammed. That the great English tenor was in full possession of his exceptional means was shown in the prayer from Charles Horsley's oratorio, Gideon, and the picturesque "Hunter's song" of Mendelssohn. He has rarely sung better. Both pieces were encored, but the first only was repeated. Madame Norman-Néruda, the queen of violinists (who ought to be called, by right of genius, Madame Joseph Joachim) also appeared at this concert, and played, with her accustomed taste and brilliancy, the concerto in F sharp minor of her master, Vieuxtemps. Madame Osgood, an American lady with a fine voice, was the other singer. The symphony was Spohr's magnificent "No. 4" (Die Weihe der Töne), the execution of which difficult work deserved all the applause it obtained—and that is saying no little. An overture, by R. Volkmann, to Shakspere's Richard III. began the concert, which came to an end with the second of Beethoven's four orchestral preludes to Fidelio. Richard III., though new to the audience, created little impression. In the last part of his overture Herr Volkmann introduces "The Campbells are coming" in order to give colour to his intended illustration of a battle. This, perhaps the only noticeable feature of the work, is not singled out, be it understood, as something to commend—inasmuch as it is a mere pointless anachronism—but as something to criticise. To Fidelio "No. 2" we can only say "Hats off!" In listening to such a masterpiece we almost feel inclined to wish that Beethoven had let well alone, and composed no other overture to his one opera. But then comes the so-called "No. 3," for which the world of art has to be grateful.—Graphic.

MINNIE HAUCK AT BERLIN.

The Berlin press is still as favourable as ever to this young lady. Herr Richard Wüerst says in the Fremden Blatt:—

"On Saturday Miss Minnie Hauck was first introduced to us as Aida. We confess that we now, for the first time, are in a position to appreciate the character in all its vocal and dramatic significance. Miss Minnie Hauck rules the field of song with an artistic mastery becoming more and more rare. While in the second and third acts we admired the flexibility of her voice, we were convinced of its volume and strength by the concerted pieces. In her acting she combined moderation with the glowing passion of the South."

Dr Gumprecht writes, as follows, in the National Zeitung:—

"Saturday presented us with Miss Hauck as Verdi's Aida. In more than one respect, the part was the most pretentious in which she had hitherto appeared before the Berlin public, and she went brilliantly through the difficult ordeal. We hardly thought her voice possessed such strength and lasting power. The intonation, always as clear as a bell, filled the ear with delight. The dramatic purport, conceived with spirit and decision, was brought out with convincing truthfulness down to its smallest details. The Ethiopian Princess is the true daughter of Meyerbeer's Selika. Hot blood courses through her veins and glowing passion in her heart. How truly she grasped the character was evident in the third act."

The same writer thus speaks of Miss Hauck's Rosina:—

"The young lady is one of the best representatives of Rosina, a part always sure, in the right hands, of achieving a brilliant success. Virtuoso-like technical skill, intelligence, and graceful delivery, are the qualities on which the composer relied, and the fair artist possesses all three of these lovely gifts. Smoothly, lightly, and without an effort, do the most intricate runs glide from her lips. With the purity of her intonation, and the correctness of her rhythmical articulation, the fundamental conditions of all musical plastics agreeable to the ear, not the smallest fault can be found. In her case, too, fioriture are no empty show-pieces of bravura singing, but a means of characterization, always filled with, and animated by, the frame of mind appropriate to the situation. The joy of youth and the sauciest roguishness came out exultingly in this romping game of notes; and through this the air and duet with Figaro first received their proper dramatic colour. Freely did the voice lavish its freshest and most melodious tones. The pieces interpolated in the Singing Lesson were the 'Madolinata' and a Waltz. A new charm was added to the first.

At the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, Miss Minnie Hauck is apparently the right artist in the right place. X.

PARIS SCRAPS.

(From our Parisian Scrapper.)

The re-appearance of M. Faure as Hamlet at the Grand Opera is again deferred in consequence of his catching cold after his return from Versailles. His general health, however, is good, and it will not be long before he makes his appearance. Mad. Carvalho is to sing Ophelia, and Mdlle de Rezké to succeed Mad. Carvalho as Marguerite in Faust.

The question of the Masked Balls at the Opera has again been under discussion. Finding that M. Halanzier was resolved not to give any balls, if obliged to pay the exorbitant rate of 25 or even 20 per cent. on the receipts to the Assistance Publique, the managing Committee of that body have offered to accept 15 per cent., for one year only, reserving the right of augmenting the impost, should they deem it advisable. This M. Halanzier refuses to concede. He requires a pledge that the Committee will continue the reduced rate as long as he conducts the Opera. If they consent, well; if not, the Bals de l'Opera will for a time be things of the past. [A good thing too.—A. S. S.]

Mdlle Sangalli has made her re-appearance in La Source.

Le Val d'Andorre still proves attractive at the Opéra Comique. The revival of Carmen is postponed, as Mdlle Chapuy plays in both works, and cannot sing every night. She is also to sustain the leading character in Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, which M. du Locle is about to revive. There is every probability of Le Voyage en Chine before many months have passed, not to speak of the first performance of Piccolino, with Mad. Galli-Marié.

Offenbach's Créole has been produced. The libretto, in three acts, from the pen of A. Millaud, is singularly free from the conventional improprieties. The following is the story. The Commandant Adhémar de Feuilles-Mortes, an officer of Louis XIV's navy, desirous of perpetuating the family name, and being too old himself for marriage, determines that his nephew René shall do so instead of himself. He fixes upon his ward, Antoinette, as the proper person to become René's wife. Of course, as the project of handing down the family name is one on which the Commandant has so firmly fixed his heart, that he never makes up his mind to put it into execution until about an hour before, in pursuance of orders from his Admiral, he must put out for a lengthened cruise. This, the reader will not fail to perceive, is indispensable. Had the Commandant adopted a course more in keeping with that pursued by ordinary uncles and guardians, beyond the sphere of comic opera, M. Millaud could never have written his libretto, and, consequently, M. Offenbach could never have set it to music. René, a dashing young musketeer, discovers that Antoinette loves a friend of his, a young barrister, named Frontignac. The cannon is heard as a signal for departure. The Commandant is obliged to set sail. The marriage knot is tied after he has left, but the "parties" tied up by it are Antoinette and Frontignac, not Antoinette and the Musketeer. René has lost his heart, at Guadeloupe, to a beautiful Creole, whose name is Dora. Wonderful to state, and well calculated to prove that truth is stranger than fiction, the Commandant returns unexpectedly to France, bringing with him no less a person than Dora herself. That interesting half-caste, having been left an orphan by her father, an old comrade of the Commandant's, the Commandant naturally adopts her. But for this noble act M. Libaut could not well have entitled his libretto La Créole, for Dora would have remained in her native isle, and never have visited the French capital. To escape the Commandant's ire, René pretends he has married Antoinette, and Frontignac is ostensibly a bachelor. The Commandant, who has a mania for marrying people to each other, determines that Dora shall become Mad. Frontignac. But, at the moment that Frontignac must either avow the truth or commit bigamy, the cannon, no less opportunely than before, again booms forth the signal of departure. On this occasion, however, for no earthly reason apparently, except it be to give the stage-carpenter a chance of achieving success, by a ship à l'Africaine, the Commandant takes all the dramatis personæ with him, to share the perils of his voyage. The secret is divulged; the Commandant pardons the offenders; and everyone is happy. The music is half-and-half music, to apply to music an epithet ordinarily reserved for beer. It is not the music of comic opera, nor the music of buffo opera; it is something betwixt and between. The best numbers are the air: "J'ai bien vu votre tendresse," and the finale, in which the couplets: "C'est moi qui suis les grands parents" play a conspicuous part; a romance: "Il vous souvient de moi, j'espère," the air of the two Notaries, the finale, a Barcarolle, the "Chanson Créole," and a Quartet.

Mdlle Vanghell was exceedingly good as the scapegrace Musketeer, René. Mad. Judic never shone to better advantage than as the Creole, and much of the success achieved is due to her. Mdlle Luce Couturier, a pupil of Roger's, made her first curtsey to the public as Antoinette, and a charming Antoinette she was. MM. Daubray, Cooper, and Fugère did justice to the characters of the Commandant, Frontignac, and St Chamas. I forgot to state the name of the theatre at which La Créole was produced. It is the Bouffes-Parisiens.

La Filleule du Roi has disappeared from the bills of the Renaissance, being replaced by Girofié-Girofla. A one-act comic opera, Les Deux Cousines, words by M. Charles Raymond, music by M. Sauvage Trudin, of Boulogne-sur-Mer, has been well received at the same theatre, the leading characters sustained by Mesdes Tomy, Panseron, MM. Duval and Caliste.

M. Palianti has died suddenly at Sainte-Périne—aged seventy, having retired from his profession only a few weeks. He belonged for a long time to the Opéra-Comique, where he played small parts, and acted as stage-manager. He was known in the French provinces and elsewhere, by the scrupulously exact Mises-en-Scène of all the works produced during his career at the Grand Opera and Opéra-Comique.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

A splendid performance of Beethoven's 7th Symphony was the most important feature of Mr Hallé's concert last Thursday. "The Andante and Variations" from Hummel's Septet, admirably played by Messrs Hallé, Brossa, Lavigne, Vanhaute, Bernhault, Vieuxtemps, and Neuwirth. Weber's Euryanthe and Reinecke's An Adventure of Handel's overtures, were also in the programme. The last named was the only novelty. Though not an ambitious work, it is scholarly and well scored; and the introduction of the "Harmonious Blacksmith" suggests a well-known but very doubtful story as the source of the 'Adventure' described in the operetta. Mr Charles Hallé played a Bach selection with perfect taste; and Mdlle Varesi, who made her first appearance in Manchester, won universal favour. We have so often been disappointed with new operatic sopranos, that the brilliant execution and finished vocalisation of this young artist was a delightful surprise.

A mournful interest was given to this concert by the performance of the Dead March in Saul, in memory of the late leader of the orchestra, whose career and death are thus feelingly referred to by the accomplished musical critic of the Manchester Guardian:—

"The concert opened with the Dead March in Saul, and many to whom this was a surprise felt a pang of sorrow when they learnt on inquiry that this was a last compliment to the memory of one whose face has been perhaps the most familiar of all objects to concert-goers in Manchester for nearly forty years. Mr C. A. Seymour, the leader of the orchestra, died on Monday last, and was buried on the morning of this concert. Only those who knew him intimately could thoroughly estimate the singular charm of his personal character. Unselfish to a remarkable degree; always ready to give way to others whom, in a spirit of self-depreciation peculiarly his own, he fancied, perhaps unjustly, superior to himself; cheerful, nay, even sunny, in mind; and youthful—so far as his desire to keep alive to the latest developments of musical art—even to the last moments of his professional career. These were some of his most charming characteristics, but they were personal to the man; and only those of his friends who knew how well his character was expressed in the sweet frankness of his winning smile can estimate the singular beauty and simplicity of his private character. For more than twenty years the writer of these lines enjoyed that privilege, the recollection of which to himself—as to Mr Seymour's professional brethren and numberless private friends—will be all the happier because it is unassociated with a single mean action or an unworthy thought."

At Mr De Jong's concert on Saturday last, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mdme Roze-Perkins, MM. Paladini, Del Puente, and Behrens, appeared, as is needless to say, with great success.

Next week, Mr Carl Rosa's company will commence an engagement at the Theatre Royal.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

(From the "Musical Standard.")

The paper with which the session of the Musical Association opened last Monday will, we hope, have, at least, one good effect, that of exciting more interest amongst English musicians in musical literature. Beyond this we cannot imagine what object will be served by a paper which consisted of little beyond well-put truisms, and did not even attempt to deal with the causes at the root of the state of things assumed to exist, or to suggest remedies. We are of opinion that the subject had been far better left alone; but, as it has been brought under discussion, we do not propose to shrink from it, and we are, in truth, not sorry to have an opportunity of giving musicians who choose to take up the attitude of critics a little advice.

The great defect of Mr Salaman's elegant essay is that it is out of date. He, like other learned and excellent musicians, is evidently not much of a reader of current literature, and he describes a state of things which, if it ever existed, does not exist now. Whatever may have been the case twenty years ago, the prosings of Dr Crotch on musical criticism hit no mark now, and their solemn reproduction before a learned society of which some of the best musical critics of the day are members, would have been an insult, had it not been rather a matter for a smile that a man should take so much pains to beat the air. We all know that it is the duty of critics to be unbiassed, that people should not write about that of which they are ignorant, that venality is to be condemned, and that partiality is odious; just as we have been taught by our copy-books that honesty is the best policy, that cleanliness is next to godliness, and so forth: it was hardly necessary to tax the attention of a learned society with such obviosities, backed by solemn quotations from respected grandfatherly authors. If Mr Salaman had a real evil to expose he should have exposed it in detail and with examples. If musical criticism is in a bad way, by all means let us have it shown up in such form as may be tangible.

We venture to think that, to put the thing in rather an Irish way, if the excellent secretary of the Musical Association could have gone into his subject more closely, he would not have gone into it at all. The exceedingly general nature of Mr Salaman's remarks renders it uncertain what are the actual evils of musical criticism which he and some of the members of the Association are apparently so deeply concerned at; but, if the paper was driving at anything, we suppose it must have been driving at the presumed low state of musical criticism in the English press. We make bold to challenge, without hesitation, any such conclusion, and to assert that English musical criticism is in a high state of efficiency, rapidly educating the music-loving public, and gradually, though with greater difficulty, producing some good effect upon musicians themselves.

What, then, is all this fuss about? We have in England a lay newspaper press of which the musical department is absolutely free from venality, and the musical posts in which are, for the most part, well filled: we have a musical press proper which is quite able to hold its own, which is far above the standard of many of the musicians for whom it exists, and is chiefly occupied in laboriously coaxing musical men to think.

The truth of the matter is simply this: musical men—it may as well be said at once—do not know their own literature. They are not a reading class; they are as a rule not conspicuous for general culture, and few of them are competent to assess the merits of the criticism which their learned society met last Monday to criticise. Only here and there a musical man in England knows anything of French or German, Greek or Latin, or reads even enough English literature to keep his head above water in the presence of educated men. Consequently they take no interest—as Mr Mackeson in his stinging and forcible speech hinted—in musical literature, and they give it little or no support. Knowing and seeing next to nothing of what is written about music, they have, nevertheless, met to pass judgment on the critics, with the result which must always follow when men talk about that of which they are ignorant. It was quite enough to be present at last Monday's discussion to find out how little the members of this society—always excepting those who are musical critics—knew about musical literature. We musical journalists, for instance, were gravely advised to give our readers reviews of the works of the old masters; and told, as a reason for doing so, that in other departments journalists were in the habit of reviewing ancient poets and authors, Milton, Virgil, and Horace! Gentlemen of the musical profession who spoke of Liszt as "Litz," who could not pronounce intelligibly the word "Gewandhaus," and who gave Wagner a denomination something like "waggoner," stood up to give lessons to journalists who every week have to skim the cream of German and French musical literature in the hope of stirring up in their insular minds some spark of intelligent interest in the drift of art currents abroad.

Such were some of the aspects presented by the meeting of last Monday. We recommend the Musical Association to let the musical critics alone. The attempt to make out a case of incompetency against them was a failure; the incidental result of betraying ignorance of current musical literature on the part of English musicians was conspicuous.

CHRISTINE NILSSON AT LIVERPOOL.

The Liverpool Daily Post, in its notice, on the 9th inst., of Madame Christine Nilsson's performance in Gounod's Faust, at the Alexandra Theatre, writes as subjoined:—

"To any one who had not seen Madame Christine Nilsson in opera her impersonation of Marguerite must have been as great a surprise as a pleasure; and, for ourselves, we must admit that, often as we have seen the opera, we never saw Marguerite—the Marguerite of Faust and Goethe—till last night. As an art study it was simply perfect, for so thoroughly natural a result was attained that the art was entirely lost sight of. It was the most admirable combination of singing and acting we have seen and heard since Jenny Lind. To enumerate excellences would be to notice nearly every phrase, to recall each change of feature, or appropriate action. Foremost, however, must stand out the Garden Scene. The abstraction with which she began her labours at the spinning wheel, her singing of the 'King of Thule,' with its natural interruptions, and of the recurring thoughts of Faust, were in marvellous contrast to the wonder and delight displayed on finding the casket, the childishness of her joy, and the gushing impetuosity of her singing of this brilliant number. The mingled nervousness and pleasure in the opening of the love scene, the exquisite pathos with which she refers to her mother and sister, her rapid change from confidence to doubt, and final admission of her love, were extraordinary displays of expression, both facial and vocal. Her tragic powers, as displayed in the painful scene attending her brother's death, in the celebrated church where she so marvellously depicts the conflict between faith and despair, and in the finale, stood out in powerful relief. In look, action, and voice, she was, to our mind, the living embodiment of the poet's ideal, and in the execution of the music, by her faultless vocalization, and clearness and purity of intonation, attained a combination of excellences which we fear we shall never see or hear again—in this part at least."

We can unhesitatingly endorse this opinion of our esteemed and learned confrère.

VENICE.—According to report, Sig. Boito's new opera, Mefistofele, will be performed here in the spring.

ANTWERP.—Gounod's Mireille has been performed here with Mad. Lemoine in the title-part, and M. Léopold Ketten as Vincent.

MILAN.—The Teatro Carcano will open with Der Freischütz. Sig. Marchetti's Ruy Blas is to be brought out at the Teatro Castelli.

BOLOGNA.—Signora Virginia Ferni, the fair violinist, and her cousin, Sig. Angelo Ferni, also a violinist, will give a series of concerts here during the present month.

ST PETERSBURGH.—Anton Rubinstein's opera, The Demon, produced last year at the Royal Operahouse, Moscow, has now been brought out very successfully here.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Mr Arthur Chappell began his 18th season on Monday night, with a programme remarkable alike for variety and interest. The Monday Popular Concerts have taken so firm a hold upon London audiences that it would be superfluous to dilate upon the healthy influence they have exercised from the commencement—what good they have done for art, and how, by strict adherence to the principles upon which they started, some sixteen years ago, they have strengthened and consolidated their position. The concert on Monday night was the 516th since the institution—for "institution" it may justly be called—was first set on foot; and the crowd of amateurs that thronged St James's Hall was a fair test of the general belief in their worth. The selection of pieces was as subjoined:—

PART I.

Quartet, in C minor, Op. 18, No. 4—strings	Beethoven.
New songs, "Dancing lightly, comes the Summer," and "Maiden mine." ...	Sterndale Bennett.
Sonata, in C, Op. 53, (Waldstein), Pianoforte	Beethoven.

PART II.

Trio, in D minor, Op. 6, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello	Bargiel.
Air, "Un aura amorosa" (Cosi fan Tutte)	Mozart.
Quartet, in D minor, Op. 76, No. 2—strings	Haydn.

Conductor, Sir Julius Benedict.

The two quartets, one at the beginning and one at the end of the concert, were in consonance with early tradition, and for that reason all the more acceptable. The chief object of the Monday Popular Concerts, as laid down by Mr Chappell in his first announcement, was to make the "public," independently of connoisseurs, acquainted with those treasures bequeathed to us by the universally recognised great masters in the form of what is termed "chamber music," and of which scarce one work out of 50 was previously known, except to a favoured minority. Now, the quartet of Beethoven was heard for the eighth, and that of Haydn for the thirteenth, time in St James's Hall. Upon the merits of these fine works it is unnecessary to dwell. Each has long been acknowledged as a capital specimen of its author, while it is equally agreed upon that each bears convincingly the impulse of the Protean Mozart—proclaimed by Richard Wagner himself the chief and most gifted of absolute musicians. The quartet of Beethoven belongs to his early period, being the fourth of a series of six (Op. 18), dedicated to one of its composer's staunchest patrons—Prince Lobkowitz, Duke of Raudnitz. It is in the first and last movements that the influence of Mozart is most vividly apparent; the second movement ("andante scherzando," in the major key), and the minuet, with trio, being Beethoven pur et simple—the former evidently springing from the same source to which we are indebted for a similar movement in the earliest of the nine orchestral symphonies. Haydn's quartet reminds us so irresistibly in more than one theme and passage of Mozart that, though we have no accepted authority for the date of its production, we are impressed with a belief that it must have been written either after Mozart's death, or, at least, after the time at which Mozart composed his quartet in the same key (D minor), and his quintet in C minor. Only the trio of the minuet and the rondo finale are in Haydn's genuine, playful, and individual manner. Each movement, nevertheless, is admirable, in its way, and the opening allegro perhaps best of all. Both quartets were capitally played by Messrs Wilhelmj, L. Ries, Zerbini, and Daubert (violoncello during the absence of Signor Piatti). Herr Wilhelmj leads a quartet with just the same facility, taste, and vigour as he plays a solo. To him Beethoven and Haydn are equally familiar, and we can imagine nothing more unaffected and artistically noble than his reading of both masters. That the audience were conscious of his merits was shown in the unanimous plaudits following movement after movement.

The pianist of the evening was Madame Annetta Essipoff, from St Petersburgh, who was so favourably received the year before last at the concerts of the Philharmonic Societies, old and new, and at some "recitals" on her own account. The sonata chosen for the occasion (happily a sonata is a sine quâ non at Mr Chappell's concerts) was that of Beethoven in C major, inscribed to Count Waldstein (Op. 53). This magnificent piece is one of the most difficult and trying of a series that would have immortalised the composer had he given nothing else to art. It presents, however, no difficulties to Madame Essipoff. She played it, indeed—the rondo in particular—with fluent ease and brilliancy, awakening the enthusiasm of the audience, who thrice called back the young and fair executant. It is worth noticing that this sonata—first introduced to a Monday Popular Concert audience by Madame Arabella Goddard, in 1859—was on Monday evening performed for the seventeenth time; so that the frequenters of St James's Hall must be tolerably familiar with its beauties. A trio (Op. 6) by Herr Waldemar Bargiel, with which some time ago Mr Charles Hallé, at his instructive recitals, made the musical public acquainted, began the second part. This trio is for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello—which, we fancy, means all that is absolutely requisite to say about it. Of originality it offers no trace, while the themes upon which it is constructed are of such a character—or, rather, have so little individual character—that the length of the work is out of proportion with the interest of its materials. The frequent introduction of works by modern composers of whom little or nothing can be known among us is highly commendable, and, doubtless, adds to the attraction of Mr Chappell's entertainments; but a single performance of Bargiel's trio is surely enough to serve all purposes. It had every chance in the hands of such artists as Madame Essipoff, Herr Wilhelmj, and M. Daubert, who did every thing possible for its success. It created, however, but faint impression, and is not likely very soon to be heard again. The players, on the other hand, were legitimately entitled to the applause that rewarded their strenuous endeavour to make something out of nothing.

The singer was Mr Shakespeare, a young Englishman, pupil of our Royal Academy of Music, who, first making himself known as a pianist and composer of ability, has recently devoted his exclusive attention to the vocal art, studying in Italy under some of the most noted professors, returning to his own country with a tenor voice of very agreeable quality, and already exhibiting marked progress. Besides an aria from Mozart's Cosi fan tutte, Mr Shakespeare brought forward two unknown songs by the late Sterndale Bennett, set to some graceful stanzas from the pen of Mr T. Case. Both are the genuine products of an experienced pen, instinct with that melodious charm and refinement of detail for which even the least ambitious of their composer's works are distinguished. Musicians may give preference to the first—"Dancing lightly, comes the summer"—but the majority of the uninitiated will, we think, find most sympathy with the second—"Maiden mine"—as unpretending and perfect a ballad as can be imagined. They were both sung with true expression by Mr Shakespeare, and accompanied on the pianoforte by Sir Julius Benedict, as he best knows how to accompany.—Times.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The "Beethoven Night" at the Royal Italian Opera House on Wednesday attracted the usual number of admirers of the music of the "tone-poet." Signor Arditi, who conducted the several works con amore, made a judicious selection. One of the overtures to Fidelio, the pianoforte concerto in E flat, the violin romance in F, and the symphony (No. 4) in B flat, formed the instrumental, "Adelaida," (sung by Mr Pearson) and "L'absence," by Mdme Roze-Perkins, the vocal portion of the programme. The members of the orchestra were on their metal, and executed the symphony to the entire satisfaction of the audience, who heartily applauded each movement. The pianoforte concerto was entrusted to Herr Stoëger, who was twice called forward at the end. We shall, doubtless, hear more of this clever artist. Madame Neruda met with deserved success. Her fine performance of the Romance elicited an "encore" so marked that it was hoped the fair violinist would have complied; but she gave an "Etude-Romance" (?) by Leonard instead, which we should have preferred hearing on another occasion, notwithstanding the perfection with which it was played. A miscellaneous selection formed the second part of the programme, in which Les Huguenots and La Grande Duchesse were called upon to supply opportunities for the solo instrumentalists of the band to exhibit their skill. Mr Pearson and Mdme Roze-Perkins contributed some vocal morceaux, the lady selecting a gipsy song entitled, "A dream wish," the characteristic words by Mrs M. A. Baines, and the music by Professor Bergson.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The students' first evening concert for the present season took place at St James's Hall, on Thursday, November 4. The following is the programme:—

Fugue, in C minor, for two performers on two pianofortes (Miss Kelly and Miss A. Duflot)—Mozart; Aria, "O! die che lode," (Miss Catharine Farquhar)—Marcello; Duet, "La Riconciliazione," (Miss Shaboe and Mr George)—Lucantoni; Sonata, in G minor (first movement), pianoforte (Miss Boole)—Schumann; Recit. ed aria, "Che farò," (Orfeo) (Miss Eliza Thomas)—Gluck; Quartet, "Quia apud te propitiatio te Domine," (De Profundis) (Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr Seligmann, and Mr A. L. Hatch)—Gounod; Sonata, Quasi Fantasia, in C sharp minor (Op. 27, No. 1) Adagio, Allegretto, Presto Agitato (Miss Bucknall)—Beethoven; Song, "When I remember" (Miss Evans)—G. A. Macfarren; Part song (MS.), "The ballad of young John and his true sweetheart"—Oliveria Prescott (Student); Lied, in A (No. 4, book 1), Mendelssohn, and Allegro brillante, in E (No. 1 from Pezzi di Bravura), Potter, pianoforte (Miss Fitch); Sacred song, "My voice shalt thou hear in the morning" (Miss Reimar)—H. C. Banister; Dueto, "Sull' aria" (Nozze di Figaro) (Miss Marietta and Miss Kate Brand)—Mozart; Aria, "Qui sdegno" (Flauto Magico) (Mr Gordon Gooch) Mozart; Allegro grazioso e brillante, from the Duo Brillante in E (Op. 19), for two performers on the pianoforte (Miss Tate and Miss Smith)—Charles E. Stephens; New part songs, "Softly come! thou evening gale" and "Pipe! red lipp'd Autumn, pipe!"—H. Smart; Melodia, "Perché piangi" (Miss Sadie Singleton)—Gounod; Trio, "Ah! taci, ingiusto core" (Don Giovanni) (Miss Shaboe, Mr George, and Mr Gordon Gooch)—Mozart; Romance, in F (Op. 50), violin (Mr Luke)—Beethoven; Recit., Solo, and Chorus "Though all thy friends" (Crucifixion) (Solo, Miss Jessie Jones)—Spohr; Allegro di Bravura (op. 31), "La Legerezza," pianoforte (Mr Charlton Speer, Sterndale Bennett Scholar)—Moscheles; Trio, "Vorrei Parlar" (Falstaff) (Miss Aylward, Miss Edouard, and Miss Bolingbroke, Parepa-Rosa Scholar)—Balfe; Song, "The sea hath its pearls" (Miss Kate Brand, violoncello obbligato, Mr Buels)—Lachner; Hunting song, "Up, up, ye Dames"—Walter Macfarren.

The accompanists of the vocal music were Miss Chute, Miss Alice Curtis (Potter Exhibition), Miss Farrar, Miss Katie Steel, Mr F. W. W. Bamfylde, and Mr Walter Fitton. Mr Walter Macfarren conducted. The pieces received with the greatest favour were the excerpt from Schumann's sonata, very intelligently played by Miss Boole; Gounod's "De Profundis," capitally sung; Beethoven's sonata, admirably given by Miss Bucknall; Mr G. A. Macfarren's song, "When I remember;" Miss Oliveria Prescott's part-song, for which the fair composer was called forward to receive the applause of the audience; Mr Henry Smart's new part-songs, and Balfe's trio from his opera, Falstaff, admirably "interpreted" by the Misses Aylward, Edouard, and Bolingbroke. From a printed circular issued by the Committee we are pleased to learn the increasing prosperity of the institution. The number of students in the Academy is now 268 (76 male and 192 female students), thirty-one new pupils having been admitted in the Lent term, 30 in the Easter, and 53 in the Michaelmas term.

Dialogues in Purgatory.

Dr Serpent.—In my opinion Charles Salaman should be re-baptised Solomon David.

Dr Ghost.—State the reasons upon which you found your opinion.

Dr Serpent.—In casting that "Stone" at the critics, Salaman outcast himself.

Dr Ghost.—My opinion is that he did nothing of the kind. Salaman wrote in the Circle.

Dr Serpent.—That particular circle is extinct. I am now the only circle.

Dr Ghost.—Hem! Then put your tail in your mouth, as Salaman did, or square yourself, as Salaman didn't.

ARABELLA GODDARD IN AMERICA.

THE subjoined is from the New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Amateur:—

"It is very difficult to say anything at all about Madame Goddard's piano-playing. She appears to me to have a mastery over the piano, peculiarly her own, and beyond the simple reach of one's pen. As the spirit moved her, she played miles away from me, and into my very ear, if you could call singing playing; for the instrument sang under her fingers. Such a continuous flow of delicate sound I had never heard previously from a piano; nor had I ever heard a grander volume in forte passages. In truth, she is a great pianist—great in every relation."

It must be gratifying to English amateurs to find an American critic not only able to appreciate but willing to acknowledge the genius and talent of a lady who, though born of English parents, is, in simple truth, the most perfect existing mistress of her art. The Americans don't yet know Arabella Goddard; but we earnestly hope they may, before she leaves; and then, because (though cautious) magnanimously chivalrous, they will, with one voice, summon her back.

IT is not alone in politics that Italy is changed from what she was since the Rè Galantuomo, guided by Cavour, first entered on the path which has led to the Quirinal. An important revolution has for some time been going on among Italian composers, and visibly affected the thirty or forty new operas annually brought out in the Ausonian Peninsula. Of this number, the great majority, like the "Capellmeister Operas" of the Germans, are seldom heard of in the rest of Europe. "Quædam bestiolæ unum tantum diem viunt," says the old Latin author. His words might be applied almost as appropriately to the operas in question as to the midges and other insects of which he is discoursing.

A contributor to the Berlin Echo directed attention, in an able notice, some months ago, to this subject, which is one possessing great interest. The leading characteristics of the productions above mentioned were not to be mistaken. The composer exerted himself, in the first place, to write in a fresh and melodious style, without troubling his head a straw as to whether or no what he wrote was in keeping with the dramatic situation. The style was calculated to show off the singers in a favourable light, and to achieve his great aim, namely:—effect. That was enough for him. So he clung with wonderful tenacity to certain traditional and antiquated forms, and one opera bore as strong a family likeness to the opera which preceded it as one jelly bears to another jelly turned out of the same mould.

But innovation is surely undermining this state of things, as the German Ocean is wasting away that insular rabbit-warren known as Heligoland. Among Italian maestri of the present decennium, bold young spirits, in whom the bump of veneration must be a cavity, have sprung up and ruthlessly ignored much in which their fathers delighted. One of the first things to go has been the Cabaletta, which, without rhyme or reason, was invariably introduced in a certain place, and in which the cornet-à-piston usually took a leading part to "support the voice;" a task it performed, as a rule, so conscientiously—and vigorously—that it was as much as the singer could do to make himself or herself heard. Many other old remnants of the past have likewise disappeared. But modern composers, in their eagerness for change, have not unfrequently jumped from one extreme to another. They have abandoned old forms to rush headlong into "endless melody," and we all know what that is:—a dreary something, in which the melody never ends, for the simple reason that it never begins. The imitators of this system fail to perceive, that even he who invented it does not blindly follow it as they do. The consequence is, that they degrade music into a mere superfluous accompaniment to the dialogue.

The painful efforts made by certain Italian composers of the present day to "suit the action to the notes and the notes to the action"—if we may parody Hamlet's instructions to the Players—often lead them into regrettable excesses. The tenor wounded unto the death, or the prima donna expiring from the effect of a poisoned chalice, were, as frequently as not, wafted into eternity by former composers on the strains of a waltz motive, or something equally well adapted for the purpose; composers of the present day illustrate such events by fearful harmonies, and treat their audiences to a course of musical pathology, aught but pleasant to nicely attuned ears. The same unreasoning zeal has misguided the advocates of the new Italian school in their treatment of the orchestra. Formerly, the orchestra played a most unimportant part. It is now exalted into undue and, so to speak, crushing preeminence. Fugued passages, contrapuntal imitations, points d'orgue and hoc genus omne, follow each other in never-ceasing and indeterminate succession. The attention of the audience is diverted from the stage to the orchestra. The opera becomes a long protracted symphony, resembling the Irishman's cable, of which some one had cut off the extremity. Many a singer, as he sinks beneath the waves of sound surging up furiously from the frantic violins, remembers with regret the cornet-à-piston of days gone by, and bitterly regrets it as the embodiment, comparatively, of silence.

As may easily be supposed, this kind of operatic-writing has not failed to meet with opposition. The anxious patriot, not perceiving its transitory nature, trembles lest the national peculiarities may disappear for ever. An ordinary theatre-goer will not, at any price, resign the Cabaletta. Recalcitrants rise up on all sides, and every opinion, no matter from whom it emanates, adverse to the new tendencies, is carefully preserved and chronicled. It is with great satisfaction that the champions of the old school recall the words of an Austrian Archduke, who, some year or two since, witnessed the production of a novelty at the Scala, Milan. On being asked how he liked the new opera, his Imperial Highness replied:—"I had hoped to hear in Italy Italian music. But people in my own country write music like that which I have heard this evening, and"—he continued, with a smile, "sometimes even better."

The writer to whom reference has been made observes that, on looking at the matter with an unprejudiced eye, we perceive in it naught save a re-action, which, long working in silence, after having been restrained, partly by political circumstances and partly by conservative adherence to what bore the stamp of tradition, has at last burst forth with unseemly vehemence. But a vigorous and purifying spirit now marks the studies of young Italian musicians. That they should want at one leap to recover the lost ground, and, in so doing, sometimes come to grief, is part and parcel of their Southern nature. Practice, however, will teach them to use discreetly and judiciously the materials at command, and there is reason to hope that any loss entailed upon Italian opera by the renunciation of a speciality which was but a dubious advantage, may be compensated by dramatic truth and ennobled form.

ARABELLA GODDARD.

(From the New York "Touchstone," October 16th.)

Although this artist appeared in concert with Tietjens, we regard her genius and individuality so strongly marked as to demand a separate article at our hands, brief though it may be.

Notwithstanding, then, that the grand performances of Rubinstein are still ringing in our ears, and that the famous Dr von Bülow has already arrived on our shores, we are of the opinion that no greater pianist than Mdme Goddard has ever visited this country, and question very much whether Europe has produced one with more exceptional powers or greater mastery over her instrument. True that, on a Wagnerian plane, there are certain distinguished performers who, through brain and muscle, and years of persistent drudgery, have worked the piano up to orchestral dimensions, as it were; but these are simply prodigies of learning and labour, who merely study the external architecture of music, and who sometimes build stupendous structures, that, however symmetrical in themselves, are cold, dark, and voiceless within. Not so with the creations of Mdme Goddard, however; for, whether she build a palace or a cot, you feel that, in the midst of light and life, she is enthroned in the one, or seated by the fireside of the other. It is impossible to describe the power, the beauty, and the delicacy of this great artist's touch, or the brilliancy of her execution. No matter what the composition, she grasps it with her fingers all aglow, as it were, and pours her very soul along the keys, until the instrument, forgetting its nature, absolutely sings in sympathy with her. No finer interpreter of Beethoven could possibly exist. There is not a secret chamber of the great master's heart of which she does not possess the key. No left hand has ever dealt out its slow movements with more stately magnificence, and no right hand has ever poured upon them more brilliant floods of sunshine. In truth, she is a rare creation, whose genius, school, and culture form a triad the most charming, and whose technique, fervour, and poesy are delightful to contemplate. * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

Mdme Goddard's début at Steinway Hall was, of course, quite worthy her world-wide fame. Like her fair sister, she was recalled and bouquetted to the last. After having enjoyed her splendid performances, one's ears itch to hear von Bülow, who is said to have some new revelations to make. On this point, however, we must possess our souls in patience, until the famous German opens Chickering Hall on the 15th of next month.

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

Too Good to be True.—We learn from America that there is every hope the Tietjens' miscellaneous concerts will be abandoned, and that the great prima donna will reserve her forces for oratorio, and subsequently for opera. We are also told that Madame Arabella Goddard and Dr von Bülow will form an artistic partnership, and give recitals together in New York and elsewhere. If the latter news be true our American friends may be congratulated on the opportunity of hearing in one room the two greatest pianists of the age.

PROVINCIAL.

Wellingborough.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was given on Wednesday last, in the Exchange Hall. The artists were Miss Ada Moore, Mrs M. A. Warren (of Mr Charles Hallé's concerts), Mr W. Williams (of Canterbury Cathedral), and Mr Orlando Christian. The chorus of fifty voices were from the town and surrounding villages. The trebles were up to their work, and the band all that could be desired. Mr Deimer was organist, and Mr Harrington conducted.

Maidenhead.—The Philharmonic Society gave their third concert on Thursday evening, November 4th. The principal artists were Miss Jessie Royd, Mr Videon Harding, and Mr Christian. Romberg's "Lay of the Bell" was the pièce de resistance. It was effectively rendered by principals, band, and chorus. Herr Rosenthal, an excellent violinist, who should be oftener heard in public, executed, with great brilliancy, Beethoven's "Romance" (Op. 40); Mr Christian did full justice to "The Desert;" Miss Royd gave a capital rendering of the solos in Mendelssohn's Loreley, and was supported by a well-balanced chorus and full orchestra; Mr V. Harding, in Sullivan's song, "The Sailor's Grave," obtained deserved applause. Herr Max Schultz conducted.

Windsor.—A grand concert was given in the Town Hall, Windsor, on Monday, by the Mayor (W. Underhay, Esq.), in aid of local institutions, under the direction of Mr John Gower. The programme included Beethoven's Sonata in D (Op. 12), for violin and pianoforte, and Schubert's Sonata in D, excellently rendered by Mr J. S. Liddle and Mr Gower. Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata and a sacred quartet, "O Lord, my God," composed by the conductor, and sung by Miss Annie Sinclair, Mr Sexton, Mr Henry Guy, and Mr O. Christian. Miss Sinclair was encored in "Softly Sighs" (Weber) and "I love my Love." Mr Christian, in Gounod's "Nazareth," and Mr H. Guy, in "Deeper and deeper still" and "My Queen," were deservedly applauded.

Cheltenham.—Ricardo Linter's recital of pianoforte music, last Wednesday week, at the Corn Exchange, was one of the most interesting that has been given for a long time. In the first part of the programme Mr Linter played a Sonata in C, and the Rondo in G, by Beethoven, and, in the second part, the Allegro, Scherzo, and the difficult Fugue of the great Sonata in B flat (Op. 106). At the conclusion, the audience became quite excited, and applauded Mr Linter most enthusiastically. The fugue was taken at a good pace, and was carried on with immense spirit. We think Mr Linter is the first pianist, in a provincial town, who has essayed this difficult sonata, and Cheltenham ought to be very proud to have a resident professor able to interpret such a work.

Brighton.—Miss Wallis concluded her engagement last Saturday at the Theatre Royal, and, on Monday, Mr. Sims Reeves made his appearance in Guy Mannering, before an audience that completely filled the theatre. Miss Fanny Heywood, Miss Annie Goodall, Mr G. Fox and Mr. Nye Chart were the coadjutors of Mr Reeves.—Signor Conti gave the last of his concerts at the Pavilion, with the assistance of Miss Helen D'Alton, Signor Pireri, Signora Rizzelli, M. Paque, Mr William Coenen, and Signora Bianchi.—Mendelssohn's Elijah is announced by Mr Watts (Cramer & Co.), to be given this morning, in the Dome, by the Brighton Philharmonic Society. Mdme Essipoff is to give a recital of pianoforte music next Friday, in the Pavilion, under the direction of Messrs Robert Potts & Co. —Mr Kuhe is already advertising his "Brighton Festival," so that the musical season may be pronounced in full swing at "London-super-mare."

MDLLE TIETJENS.

(From the New York "Touchstone.")

It is amusing to witness the manner in which some of our dailies and weeklies pepper Mdlle Tietjens with snipe-shot, because she is unable to transmute concert into opera. This distinguished cantatrice came to this country to give us a season of concert, as announced; but no sooner had she begun to fulfil her engagement, than those critics who hear with their eyes only, and who are incapacitated from appreciating music, per se, or loving it for its own dear sake, demand that it shall assume all the parade and adventitious trappings of the lyric stage.

Whatever may be said to the contrary, the bare boards and the naked walls of the concert-room afford the best and surest means of testing the vocal powers, the training, and the musical genius of any artist who comes amongst us, as Mdlle Tietjens does, in search of wealth and fame. Is not all music sufficient unto itself? Or has "Bel raggio" to hobble about, halt, or maimed, or blind, until it stumbles in before the footlights of the opera, and picks up its eyes, or the gilded crutches of costume and scenery. The idea is inadmissible, and is never indulged by those who are sensitive to all that is exquisite in the divine art, or who are sufficiently educated to pronounce upon it with the highest intelligence. Music is obviously intended to steal upon the soul through the gates of the ears only. The eyes, consequently, are not necessary to its appreciation in any degree. She who fails as an artist in concert can only succeed on the lyric stage through her dramatic powers. Hence the false criticisms which now obtain in relation to Mdlle Tietjens' performances at Steinway Hall, and the absurdity of following a line of argument with reference to her singing which would go to prove that the cup gives body, mellowness, and flavour to the wine.

We do not intend to compliment Mdlle Tietjens after the manner of some of our contemporaries, who have most graciously conceded to her a fine stage presence, a large and highly-cultivated voice, and a superb method—all of which they have long inferred, necessarily, from the comments of the English press upon her for upwards of twenty years.* But what we do intend to compliment her on is the volume, compass, quality, and evenness of her voice, and the vast scope and power which she has displayed at her concerts here, in rendering so magnificently three such widely different numbers as the "Last Rose of Summer," the Grand aria and scena from Der Freischütz, and "L'Ardita," a waltz, by Arditi. These are all representative compositions, demanding such various treatment and poses of sentiment that one wonders at the perfect grace, the grandeur, and the brilliancy which characterised them individually. This sweep of coast has been seldom travelled with so sure and certain a step as that of Mdlle Tietjens, although the sunlight that fell upon her path was, perhaps, at times, somewhat cold and phosphorescent.

That Mdlle Tietjens is a very grand artist there can be no doubt; although, as is the case with most large voices, her execution is not extraordinarily brilliant, and would not, perhaps, tell in lengthy, rapid, and elaborate passages with such fine effect as that of Nilsson or De Murska. Still, it never fails; while, at intervals, it is as swift, clean, and true as the flash of a swallow's wing. Her début here was most successful, although she had to struggle against a very questionable orchestra, and a couple of male singers—one of whom was utterly slipshod and inaudible, while the other suggested the idea of a person who was singing vigorously at a mark. She gives her next matinée at Steinway's to-day, Saturday; and appears in oratorio, with the Centennial Choral Society, on Wednesday next, when some critic will have an opportunity of saying something about her in oratorio.

* Mdlle Tietjens made her first appearance among us in 1858.—D.P

MEFISTOFELE.

A New Italian Opera by a New Italian Composer.

The new drama is divided, as we have said, into six parts—a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue.

The prologue gives a great development to the Prologue in the Heavens of Faust. The celestial phalanxes, the Chorus Mysticus, the cherubs, the archangels are inviaible behind the nebulæ, from which the mighty sound of the seven trumpets and the booming of the seven thunders, and Mephisto alone in the shadow, leaning his feet on the skirt of his mantle, lays his wager with God, and then disappears, vexed by the angels. At this point, M. Boito has added a prayer of the penitent woman, which rises from the earth to the heaven, a quite new and splendid idea, for, to the sublime thought of the Paradise, it adds all that the earth has of most poetic and beautiful, the fervid prayer of the woman to God.

The first act is divided into two parts: the first—the Easter Sunday—is worked out from the "Before the City Gate;" the second—the Pact—corresponds with the scenes entitled the Study, except the chorus of the invisible spirits and the dialogue of Mephisto with the scholar.

The second act, also, is divided into two parts: the first—the Garden—is worked out of the two scenes, Garden and Martha's Garden; the second—the night of Sabbath—from the night of Walpurgis, except the acting, with the addition of the "world-song," in the witches' kitchen.

The third act—the death of Margaret—is the scene of the Prison, with which the first Faust ends.

The fourth act carries us into the Night of the Classical Sabbath, which is worked out from the Classical Night of Walpurg. The vastness of the picture of Goethe obliged M. Boito to omit many episodes; so he chose, as a hinge to his Classical Sabbath, the scene in which Faust, adorned as a cavalier of the middle age, presents himself to Helena.

The epilogue, the death of Faust, keeps a little off from the first act of the second Faust; and, though the new epilogue is, dramatically, of great effect, we must own that the epilogue of the first edition was, poetically, much more praiseworthy and quite faithful to the text. Faust, in his old age, is again sitting down in his study, and raves; at his side Mephisto, who, foreboding that his death is near, looks out for the transition of his soul. Celestial songs are heard, and Faust is listening to them. Mephisto, to tempt him, evokes the Sirens, but Faust relies upon the Gospel; and, absorbed in the celestial vision, dies, whilst the angels put Mephisto to flight with a rain of sunbeams, songs, and flowers.

As we consider it in its integrity, this drama may be set down among the most artist-like works; and even opposers involuntarily paid to it the homage of spending pages of journalistic writing to demonstrate—though without success—that it was not worth the trouble of occupying themselves with it. The verse is sometimes too eccentric, sometimes too rough, but always robust and never vulgar. Here and there we find pieces of good poetry which might worthily appear in the works of every good author. And the experiment of introducing—to give more vivacity to the scene—the measure of the Greek verse, in the Classical Sabbath, has also happily succeeded. The best attestation of esteem to the poet has been given by the public; the demand for the book being so great that, on the evening of the first representation, the third edition was already exhausted.

What we have said is enough on account of the drama. As we come to speak of the music, we must premise that, when we declare our opinion about the work of M. Boito, we do not bear in mind that it is his first work—for in art there is no law of succession; therefore, the praise that, faithful to truth, we must bestow on the author, should not be confused with that which is generally and unjustly bestowed, under pretext of encouraging, upon anyone scarce emerging from mediocrity.

The bold idea of setting Faust to music rose in the mind of M. Boito when he was still young, and his musical studies were not yet finished. If we do not mistake, the first fragments were written in 1861. In these fourteen years, M. Boito, fascinated by the great conception of Goethe, though he was not continually occupied in setting it to music—for he turned his mind also to two other operas, which we hope to see soon finished—yet continually pondered it over in his mind, and made it the principal aim of his studies. With true artistic ambition, very learned, and endowed with an extraordinary perception of the beautiful, he understood, as few men understand, how Faust is philosophically and literally sublime; and he felt what the music should be to express with equal strength an equal conception in another art; but, as he was not ready to delude himself on account of the merit of his work, nor so proud as to impose thus upon others and himself his own work, he made, changed, made again, till his conscience of artist told him that he had done all that he could do to set the subject to music. Thus fourteen years elapsed: but the past years, for M. Boito, stopped in his Mefistofele, in which we find all the most beautiful ideas that rose in the mind of the author during that period; we find in it the fruit of the studies of about three lustres; we find in it all the vigour and impetuosity of the juvenile boldness, not deteriorated, not weakened, but moderated by the severe education of the mind.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The first of Messrs Harrison's subscription concerts attracted one of the largest and most brilliant audiences ever seen in the Town Hall; even the orchestra, usually devoted to the lowest priced portion, being filled with reserved seats, which were taken some days before the performance. No doubt the "bright particular star" mainly contributing to this result was the renowned Swedish songstress, Christine Nilsson, whose first appearance in Birmingham, at the Festival of '67 (since which time she had only sung here once), made so highly favourable an impression on the metropolis of the Midlands. The reception accorded to Mdme Nilsson was of the warmest; and, as the prima donna humoured her admirers by responding to the applause which followed each of her solos, not only re-appearing, but acceding to the encores, the public had the satisfaction of listening to "Auld Robin Gray" as a sequence to the "Air des bijoux" (preceded by the "Rè de Thule" ballad from Faust); "The minstrel boy to the war is gone," after Arthur Sullivan's graceful new song, "The sun is setting"; and a repetition of the "Dalecarlian Dance" melody, the second of the Swedish airs. In addition to this, Mdme Nilsson took part in the trio, "This magic wove scarf," from Barnett's delightful opera, The Mountain Sylph—an opera in which the couleur locale of Scotland is distinctly impressed. Mr Carl Rosa's success in London may induce him to produce this opera, which, with Edward Loder's Night Dancers, would, for the present generation, have the charm of novelty; while to those whose remembrance carries them so far back to the past, pleasant memories would be evoked. Miss Alice Fairman, Mdlle Levier, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli contributed their share to the programme, which was essentially of the miscellaneous order; while Mr Kuhe furnished the pianoforte solos, one of which, under the title of "Victoria," was an arrangement of "God save the Queen," with variations. The post of accompanist was filled in a highly efficient manner by Mr F. H. Cowen, who, I am glad to learn, is commissioned, for the Birmingham Festival of 1876, to write a secular cantata, for the subject of which he has chosen Byron's Corsair.

The six nights of the Carl Rosa Company at the Theatre Royal were an unqualified success, the house being crowded every evening by an enthusiastic and appreciative audience. The operas played were Marriage of Figaro, Porter of Havre, Faust, Trovatore, Fra Diavolo, and The Bohemian Girl; the principal parts being sustained by Mdlle Torriani, Misses Rose Hersee, Josephine Yorke, Julia Gaylord, Lucy Franklein, Mrs Aynsley Cook; Messrs Santley, Nordblom, Packard, Lyall, Aynsley Cook, Celli, and Arthur Howell; Mr Carl Rosa, of course, officiating as conductor. As all the operas and artists named have so recently been heard in London, it is needless to recapitulate what has already been said about them in the Musical World. Suffice it that Birmingham was delighted with the various performances, and Mr Simpson, the lessee of the theatre, must have been satisfied with the financial results of his enterprise.

CRITICS, AMATEURS, AND PROFESSORS.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

Musicians and public performers of all kinds have an undoubted right to protest as often as they may think fit against criticism, and in their turn criticise the critics. Things have changed since the days when Cowper apostrophized the newspaper as

"Happy broad-sheet
Which not e'en critics criticise!"

Newspapers, as the dispensers of praise and blame, are very much criticised, especially by those who imagine that more blame than they deserve has been allotted to them. The recipients, however, of praise are generally disposed to admit—as long, at least, as the memory of the praise remains with them—that the press is not such a hopelessly bad institution after all. At a meeting held last Monday of a society of musicians and amateurs, who assemble periodically for purposes of discussion, and on the understanding, strictly enforced, that members are under no pretext to bring their instruments with them, a Mr Salaman, pianist, composer, and musical critic, read a paper on musical criticism as it is and as it should be. After a rapid glance at the history of musical criticism, from Plutarch to some obscure writer in an unnamed journal of the present day, who seems now and then to get out of his depth, the lecturer painted an animated picture of the true musical critic as he—and many others—would like to see him. Mr Salaman would require that he should possess a thorough knowledge of the history of music, be a good theoretical and practical musician, entertain no prejudices in favour of one school more than another, and write a good style. A man endowed with the gifts and acquirements stipulated for by Mr Salaman would indeed be quite equal to the task of "chronicling small beer." By way of making his meaning unmistakably plain, the lecturer mentioned Robert Schumann as a good specimen of the able and impartial critic; and certainly no objection could be taken to Mr Salaman's choice. If, however, we had a Schumann among us, he would probably make it his chief business not to criticise the works of others, but to compose works of his own.

After pointing out what should be avoided in musical criticism, Mr Salaman mentioned (in addition to Robert Schumann) a few musical critics whose writings he considered worthy of admiration. One of these was the late Mr Chorley; M. Fétis another. Now Mr Chorley was at least conscientious and accurate in regard to facts; but if Mr Salaman will only consult no matter which of the few and scanty articles devoted by M. Fétis to English musicians, he will find it not so much disfigured as characteristically marked by glaring and ridiculous blunders. The critic whom Mr Salaman holds in such high esteem confounds John Barnett with Sterndale Bennett, and gravely states where the operas were produced to which he imagines the overture entitled the Wood Nymphs was prefixed. After praising M. Fétis—who speaks with never-failing contempt of English musicians, and proves his scorn to be genuine by his manner of treating the lives and works of those he does not absolutely ignore—it was not inconsistent on the part of Mr Salaman to blame the Germans for their neglect of English composers; the Germans who have produced at Leipsic, their great musical capital, important orchestral works by Cipriani Potter, Sterndale Bennett, G. A. Macfarren, Arthur Sullivan, and even (we scarcely know why) the late Mr Hugo Pierson.

Mr Pierson, whose "symphonic preludes" have been engraved by a Leipsic firm, would scarcely have found a publisher for his compositions in England. The difficulty of placing such works as his would perhaps have been somewhat increased by the fact, as stated by Mr G. A. Osborne, the eminent pianist and composer of pianoforte pieces, that no London music publisher can read a note of music. In that, it seems to us, lies their safety. Mr Osborne thought their ignorance deplorable; but he proved that it was profitable by citing the unique case of a gentleman who, although he possessed a considerable knowledge of music, became a music publisher and was ruined through bringing out the symphonies and oratorios of his admiring friends. He could not plead inability to appreciate them. He had eaten of the tree of musical knowledge, and naturally fell. The connection between Mr Osborne's story of the accomplished music publisher and the subject of Mr Salaman's lecture was not very evident; but the tale was probably intended to suggest that unknown composers suffered more from the ignorance of publishers than from that of critics.

If critics ought to possess adequate knowledge of the subjects they undertake to discuss, similar qualifications may not unfairly be required of persons undertaking to discuss the subject of criticism. Dr W. H. Stone, in enlarging on the incompetency and bad faith of musical critics, informed the meeting that the articles published in London newspapers on musical matters were usually written by "the office boy," adding, as if to give a look of probability to his statement, that some of these young men were personal friends of his. He further observed that the written judgments of his juvenile friends were often but amplifications of his own spoken remarks; so that in denouncing the worthlessness of musical criticism he somewhat unnecessarily condemned himself. It is evident, indeed, that if Dr Stone's statement is accurate he has only to improve himself as a musical critic in order to improve musical criticism generally.

The rules of the Musical Association do not, it appears, allow speakers at the discussion meetings to mention living persons or existing journals by name. Journals, however, may be described by nicknames or by opprobrious epithets; and journalists may be indicated through allusions to their private affairs or the affairs of their wives or of their wives' relations. Instead of imparting the true parliamentary tone to the debates, these strange regulations develop a certain vulgarity on the part of speakers who, if they were permitted to call persons and things by their right names, would, at least, not be able to plead in extenuation of their offensiveness that they are driven to it by the laws of the society against the use of plain language. When Dr W. H. Stone spoke of one writer as the Hog in Armour, and of another as the Dancing Barber, his humour seemed to be much appreciated. But no sooner had a gentleman risen to say that he had read musical articles not wholly absurd in several papers, citing in particular the Guardian, than he was called to order, the president reminding him that in mentioning a journal by its proper name he had broken one of the rules of the society. Thus pulled up, and not perhaps caring to speak of the Guardian as the Churchwarden, or the White Choker, or the Gentleman in Black, the speaker turned to another subject, and asked the numerous professors present whether, instead of reviling the newspapers, it would not be a good thing on their part to abstain from giving their pupils ridiculous pieces of music to learn. The suggestion was a happy one. If the professors are seriously anxious to raise the tone of musical criticism in this country, they will do very little towards that end by reading lectures to one another on the subject. It would be a very roundabout process, moreover, to educate Dr Stone so as to enable him, in his turn, to educate the critics. It is for the professors to form the taste of their pupils; and they will find this novel occupation, if they can be persuaded to adopt it, one of real utility.

CHARLES MATHEWS.

A morning performance for the benefit of this popular comedian was given on Monday at the Gaiety, when, after the comedy of My Awful Dad, Mr Charles Mathews thus addressed an audience which filled the house in every part:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen—I have promised a few words, and I am here to redeem my promise. An actor has always this advantage—he not only promises but performs. 'A few words' is a vague expression. The few words of some men would fill a column, while those of others would scarcely make a paragraph. Mine are of the latter description. I am a man of few words, and never trouble you with them except on particular occasions—when I really have something particular to say—and this is one of them. Of course the nature of the few words depends upon the circumstances. A few words with one's sweetheart are worth a week's talk with one's mother-in-law, and when a man has a few words with his wife—however much he may love her—the consequences are anything but agreeable. Now, a few words at parting are naturally expected to be of a lachrymose character; but I am not sentimental, nor given to the melting mood, so you will excuse the non-appearance of my white handkerchief. As I have observed, I never say a few words except when I am going away, but, as I am always going away, you may think that I am always saying a few words. But then I am always coming back again, and I hope this will be no exception to the rule, so there really is no occasion for tears on either side. I am only going on a little pleasure trip. The weather here is very far from tempting, and I can't do better than step out of it. A severe winter is predicted, so I avail myself of the opportunity of avoiding it, and, as the Major would say, of 'enjoying my Indian summer.' It is a trip I have long contemplated. Three years ago I had nearly accomplished it, and got as far as Ceylon, but my foot slipped and I drifted over to Australia. I then determined to take India on my way back, but the wind shifted, and I found myself in the Sandwich Islands. This, however, I did not regret, for I there passed one of the most memorable evenings of my life. I played 'by command and in the presence of his Majesty Hame-hame-ha, the fifth King of the Cannibal Islands,' before an audience of Kanakas—black gentlemen, who a few years ago would have supped off me with pleasure, and who find it difficult even now to resist the occasional delicacy of a fat baby on the sly. If all goes well I calculate upon reaching Calcutta at last, and shall probably play there about Christmas time, under the patronage of the Rajah Ram Jam Cuttery Poo, or the lovely Begum Catty Fatty Bunkum Hoy, and on my return you may expect to see me riding up to the stage door of the Gaiety on my favourite elephant. Where my next trip may be is not yet settled. I am balancing between a provincial tour to the Arctic Regions and to the interior of Africa, but have to wait till the theatres there have opened for their regular winter season. However, before I go you shall, as usual, have another few words, so that you may be kept informed of my movements. I think I see before me several well-known faces, constant attendants, who have listened to a number of few words on numerous occasions. I hope I do not misinterpret them. There is a story told of a man who went every night to see Van Amburgh put his head in the lion's mouth, in order that he might be sure of not missing the moment when it would be bitten off. Who knows but that the same sort of feeling may exist with regard to my few words, and that the hope that they may be my last may animate the listener? If so, I shall try and baulk his morbid desire, and do my best to outlast him. I have beaten him so far, and will make a struggle for it still. I have enjoyed the favour of the public for forty years, and have grown all the stronger for its support. Who knows how long I may yet enjoy it? At all events, I have had the gratification of finding that even after so long a period, and notwithstanding the growth of so many young and bright intellects around me, I am still able to afford the same amusement that I did nearly half a century ago, and that I am permitted not only to play my old parts to the satisfaction of the audience, but have been allowed to write and act a new one, meeting with even more than my old success. I shall carry the pleasant remembrance with me wherever I go, and I shall hope to return and find you all as hearty and kind as ever. I have just concluded not only a most successful but a most delightful engagement, petted by the genial manager and his cordial company, and have nothing but thanks to bestow on all my friends before and behind the curtain. These are my few words, ladies and gentlemen, and I trust they are enough; at any rate they are sincere, and I can say no more. I wish you all health and happiness (including myself), and look forward with hope and pleasure to our next merry meeting."

Prolonged cheering and applause followed the address, and the favourite actor was recalled amid a renewal of hearty demonstrations, conveying good wishes for his pleasant trip and speedy return.

DRESDEN.

(From a Correspondent.)

The number of concerts in contemplation for next winter are considerably more than usual; indeed, quite a deluge. Besides the concerts of the Chapel Royal, and the Trio and Quartet Soirées, there are to be the Subscription Concerts of Musik-director Mansfeldt, also two grand concerts of the Neustädter Choral Society, at the first of which Schumann's music to Faust will be given, complete. Then there are a number of concerts by foreign artists in view, as usual. The concerts and musical soirées at the Royal Belvedère, by Capellmeister Erdmann-Puffholdt, have been particularly interesting. The following is the programme of a recent soirée:—War March from Athalie (Mendelssohn); Overture, Lodoiska (Cherubini); aria from Il Seraglio (Mozart); Loreley, Legend for Orchestra, with harp obbligato (C. Oberthür); Serenade, for flute, violin, and tenor (Op. 25), (Beethoven); Overture, Turandot (V. Lachner); "Le desir," melodie for violoncello (Stahlknecht); "Songs without Words" (Mendelssohn); "Traumbilder" Fantasie (Lumbye). The harp part to Oberthür's Loreley was played by Fräulein Melanie Ziech, daughter of the esteemed harpist of the Royal Operahouse, Herr Carl Ziech. The young lady produced a remarkably fine tone, and met with hearty applause. Beethoven's serenade was played, in excellent style, by Herren G. Schirmer, E. Puffholdt, and Ph. Faber. Herr H. Dechert, also, deserves special notice for his performance of the violoncello solo.

SIMS REEVES AT BRIGHTON.

(From the "Sussex Daily News.")

As far as Brighton is concerned, Messrs Cramer and H. Nye Chart would appear to have a monopoly of Mr Sims Reeves' services. Whenever he sings here, it is either at the concerts of the former or at the theatre of the latter. And at the latter his brief engagement forms one of the brightest episodes in Mr Chart's annual programme. This year his engagement is briefer than usual. It comprises but two nights. But these two nights are appropriated for two of the works in which he is best known—Guy Mannering and The Beggars' Opera. In the first of these he appeared last evening. A fashionable and crowded house assembled to greet him. It is on such occasions that the accommodation of Mr Chart's elegant little theatre is tested to the utmost. No difficulty would have been experienced in admitting several hundred persons more had there been room for them. On presenting himself, the great English tenor was most cordially welcomed. He was in capital voice, and sang with all his accustomed success. "When other lips," "Tom Bowling," and "My pretty Jane," his three introduced songs, were given with that mellowness and suavity, that artistic style and refined expression, which has marked his vocalisation throughout his lengthened career. Lengthened his career has been, but nothing so long as the preposterous period put forward by a local print. According to this eminently well-informed journal, Mr Sims Reeves has been on the stage 54 years. As a matter of fact, he has not been before the public much more than half that period. Long or short, however, Mr Reeves' career has been an unexampled success among native vocalists; and, for intellectual vocalism, he is simply unapproached. All his well-known qualities of voice and style were exhibited last night. Each of his songs was followed by loud and persistent applause; and though Mr Sims Reeves set his face against encores, he could not resist the appeal of the audience to repeat the second verse of "My pretty Jane," a song which he has made peculiarly his own. The great tenor, who, of course, took the part of Henry Bertram, was well supported by Miss Fanny Heywood (Julia Mannering), Miss Annie Goodall (Lucy Bertram), Mr George Fox (Gabriel), and Mr H. Nye Chart, who sustained his old and favourite part of Dominie Sampson. The band had been strengthened for the occasion, and Mr Sidney Naylor was conductor.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From a Correspondent.)

The greatest hit that has been made in Paris lately is Le Voyage dans la Lune, the music by Offenbach, now being given at the Gaité. So sanguine is the enterprising manager of a long run of the "Opera féerie," as it is entitled, that he has engaged a double troupe of artists, in case of accident or indisposition of any of the original cast—a capital arrangement. M. Vizentini had also an eye to the public in this double-cast arrangement. He will never have to shut up the Gaité, and put up a notice:—"Relâche pour cause d'indisposition."

Le Voyage is in four acts and twenty-three tableaux, and they are tableaux! No expense has been spared on the scenery, decorations, costumes, &c., and M. Cornil well deserves the hearty applause he nightly wins, for the very effective scenery he has put on the stage. The plot is not very complicated, and, as no doubt you have read all about it in the Times and Telegraph, I will not go into details. There are two very effective ballets, danced by 120 coryphées, Mdlle Vittorina Fontabello being the "1er Sujet." The second ballet, entitled Les Flocons de Neige, is unapproachable for good taste.

I see by the Entr'acte that M. Vizentini, the lucky lessee of the Gaité, is taking from 9,000 fr. to 9,500 fr. a night with Le Voyage dans la Lune.

On Nov. 7th I attended the fourth Concert Populaire de Musique Classique, at the Cirque d'Hiver, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup. The place was crammed; and there must have been over 6,000 persons in the building to listen to the following programme, selected from the compositions of German composers only:—

Symphonie in C major—Allegro, Andante, Minuet, Finale—(Beethoven); Allegro agitato (Mendelssohn); 4th Concerto pour piano, Op. 70—Allegro moderato, Andante, Finale—(Rubinstein), exécuté par M. Diemer; Fragments du Quintet, Op. 108—Larghetto, Menuet, Allegretto con variazione—(Mozart), exécuté par M. Griset (clarinette) et tous les intruments à cordes; Overture d'Oberon (Weber).

The whole of this was gone through under the able conductorship of M. Pasdeloup, in a manner which left nothing to be desired. M. Griset's clarinet playing also excited much applause, and a recall; while M. Diemer's pianoforte performance met with the same success.

ZARÉ THALBERG AT GLASGOW.

(From the "Scotsman.")

Mdlle Thalberg is beyond question one of the most important accessions made of late years to the rank of leading soprani. She is very young, but she has a voice of great strength, purity, and uncommon range, which she manages with an ease and certainty that many vocalists of greater experience might envy, and which speaks volumes for the excellence of her trainer. Mdlle Thalberg's style is truly artistic. Her intonation is faultless, and her declamation thoroughly tasteful. The part of Dinorah gives little scope for the display of dramatic power, but her rendering gave every indication that, as an actress, Mdlle Thalberg has not much to learn, and at all events nothing to unlearn. She sang the opening aria, "Si Carina," very sweetly and pathetically, and gave a vivacious rendering of the sparkling duet with Corentino, which follows. Nor was she less effective in the terzetto with which the first act closes. Mdlle Thalberg's greatest effort, however, was the "Shadow song," one of the most exacting tests of a vocalist's power of execution in the whole range of opera. Its endless runs and shakes were all given in perfect precision, and the upper D flat was taken without apparent strain—a sweet, clear note, quite devoid of shrillness. The audience were vociferous in their applause, and insisted on an encore, which the vocalist accorded. All the other music of the part was effectively rendered, and, in fact, Mdlle Thalberg's Dinorah was entirely successful.

MDLLE TIETJENS.

We read as follows in the correspondence of the Liverpool Daily Post:—

"Mdlle Tietjens, our great tragic singer, has not been a success in America. It was thought that she was great enough without any attempt at getting up false public excitement. Besides, M. Strakosch had been found out in getting up beforehand similar demonstrations for Madame Patti. So he let Mdlle Tietjens come out without announcing her name. The result was that the people were cold. The critics, following suit, were cold also. They quizzed Mdlle Tietjens for her size, and spoke of her "worn out" voice, and kept the people away. The result is the failure of the concerts. When the critics were charged with unfairness, they said that they wished to force Mdlle Tietjens out in opera. The American newspapers think it right to do evil that good may come."

To this Mr Mapleson gives a smashing triumphant retort, which we subjoin:—

"(To the Editor of the 'Daily Post.')

"Sir,—Being partly interested in Mdlle Tietjens' American tour, and regularly furnished with the official returns, I have read with equal surprise and amusement an extraordinary statement in your London Letter of this morning, that her concerts have failed. So far as your correspondent states that no attempt has been made to get up false public excitement he is well informed, but in every other particular he is grossly in error. Mdlle Tietjens has had the greatest reason to be delighted with her reception by the American public, with the unanimous and most graceful applause of the Press, and with the financial results of the enterprise. Not only have her own terms of £200 per concert been regularly paid her on each occasion, but in several instances she has, in pursuance of her agreement, received a further emolument in the shape of profit when the receipts touched a certain amount. There has been a cry out for opera by the influential stockholders of the New York Operahouse, but the firm adherence of M. Strakosch—who had engaged Mdlle Tietjens for "concerts" only—to his original plan has not in the least interfered with the popularity or success of her appearances.—Yours, &c.,

"J. H. Mapleson.

"North-Western Hotel, Nov. 8, 1875."

This would seem (with consent of the Messrs Strakosch) to set the matter at rest.

NEW YORK.

(From a Correspondent.)

Mr Maurice Strakosch has written to the Press, pointing out the difficulties of establishing Italian Opera here. He refers to the losses incurred by every manager who has hitherto made the attempt. Everywhere else, he says, Italian Opera is supported either by State subventions or private subscriptions, and it cannot be carried on in New York more than anywhere else without either the former or the latter. He proposes, therefore, to start a subscription list. He promises that, if this list is filled up within a reasonable period, he will have in New York, by the 1st January, a company comprising the principal artists of Her Majesty's Opera, and that he will give a lyric season worthy the most important city in the New World. CHRISTINE NILSSON'S MARGARET.

(From the "Liverpool Daily Courier.")

"The inaugural performance of the opera season given last evening must be deemed a very great success, both in regard to the crowded state of the house and the general excellence of the interpretation. The work was Gounod's Faust, and the cast as follows:—Faust, Signor Gilandi; Mephistopheles, Signor Castelmary; Valentino, Signor Galassi; Wagner, Signor Costa; Siebel, Madame Trebelli; Martha, Madame Lablache; and Margherita, Madame Christine Nilsson. Madame Nilsson's assumption of the part of Margherita is undoubtedly one of the finest creations on the lyric stage. It is entirely original and invested from first to last with the strongest marks of the most intellectual study. Goethe himself never could have desired a more thorough realisation of his poetic ideal. In the garden scene the charm of Madame Nilsson's vocalisation was chiefly observable, but in the later portions of the opera, the vocal effects, grand as they were, were almost lost sight of in the magnificent acting which accompanied them; in fact, it was the universally expressed opinion, and one in which we fully concur, that this is the first time that Margherita has really been played here. Madame Nilsson's charming ideal personality of course aids her very much; but the intensity of her acting, artistically, culminating to a most exciting point in the last scene, sets the whole on a standpoint we have never seen approached by any other artist. It can only be matter of regret that the exigencies of the short season prevent the opportunity being afforded of a second rendering."

BRUSSELS.

(From a Correspondent.)

The promised revival of Le Pardon de Plöermel, otherwise and more generally known, in England at least, as Dinorah, came off at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie, under circumstances of more than usual interest. The King and Queen were present, with his Portuguese Royal Highness, the Duke of Coimbra. The opera went off most satisfactorily, and it is open to doubt whether the part of the heroine ever found, at Brussels, a more efficient and charming representative than Mdlle Dérivis, not even excepting Mad. Boulart and Mdlle Marimon. As Corentin, M. Bertin displayed great intelligence and spirit, while M. Morlet made a deep impression in the character of Hoël. A word of praise is due to the orchestra. With the restoration of M. Sylva to health, La Juive has resumed its place in the bills. The fact requires no particular comment, save that M. Libert has ceded the part of Prince Leopold to M. Bertin. In consequence of illness, Mad. Pauline Lucca is not able to fulfil her starring engagement here at the time specified. It will be deferred, probably, a month or six weeks. The lady was taken ill at Cologne.

On Monday, the 1st instant, the Mass, with full band, by Sig. Giulio Roberti, was duly performed at the collegial church of St Gudule and St Michael, as was also the "Expectans Expectavi"—interpolated in the Offertorium—by M. Polak-Daniels. The critics have not pronounced a very favourable opinion, either of the larger or the less pretentious work. They find that both Roberti and Polak-Daniels are deficient in inspiration, and endeavour to conceal this under a mass of trivial details.

We hear that Mr Arthur Chappell intends, during the present season of the Monday Popular Concerts, to produce many of the posthumous works of the late Sterndale Bennett. Amongst these are several songs, and a charming set of short pianoforte pieces, illustrating every month of the year. Since Sterndale Bennett's great champion, Madame Arabella Goddard, departed to practise her profession abroad, the pianoforte music of the great English master has not been heard so frequently as it ought to have been; but Mr Arthur Chappell has now taken the matter in hand, and we are convinced the result will prove the accuracy of his judgment. Of those of Sterndale Bennett's songs which have never yet been heard in public, Mr W. Shakespeare, one of Bennett's old Academy pupils, sang "Maiden Mine" and "Dancing Lightly" at last Monday's Popular Concert. "Sunset" will be sung in the course of the season, as will also "Stay, my Charmer." The last-named song is alone, strictly speaking, a "posthumous" work, it existing only in manuscript, while the rest of the set (Op. 47) were printed, and ready for publication before the gifted composer's death.—Saturday Programme.

The theme of "Il a le pompon" will soon be the rage.

The Fée aux Chansons, a piece in five acts by M. Ernest Dubreuil, has been produced at the Cluny Theatre, but with only moderate success. The idea of the piece is to pass in review all the characters celebrated by popular songs, from Monsieur de la Palisse down to Monsieur et Madame Denis, and comprising "Fanfan la Tulippe," "Madelon," "Friquet," &c.

At a meeting of the general committee, in Birmingham, the Marquis of Hertford in the chair, a report from the orchestral committee, describing the arrangements in progress for the Birmingham Triennial Festival of 1876 was read and adopted. The report set forth that the ensuing meeting, which would inaugurate the second century of these Festivals, would be presided over by the Marquis of Hertford, and that the conductorship would devolve again on Sir Michael Costa, who has just returned to this country from the South, in good health. The subject which had principally engaged the attention of the orchestral committee concerned the new works to be produced next year, which, it states, will comprise an important contribution from "England's greatest living composer, together with a secular composition by a rising and talented native musician," and will further introduce to this country "the foremost musician of that land to which Thorwaldsen and Hans Christian Andersen owe their birth—viz., Professor Niels W. Gade, of Copenhagen, who has, at the request of the committee, undertaken the composition of a new secular cantata for the Festival, and who is to visit England for the purpose of conducting it in person." The committee, it is also stated, "have arranged with Professor G. A. Macfarren for the composition and first performance of a sacred work of important dimensions, which will occupy the greater part of one of the mornings, and which, they have reason to hope, will rank in importance and musical excellence with the recent work by the same composer, St John the Baptist, which has been received with so much favour by the musical public." The third new work in course of preparation for the Festival is by Mr F. H. Cowen, and will take the form of a secular cantata. Negotiations were opened with M. Gounod for a new work for this Festival nearly two years ago, but, so far, they have been unsuccessful. M. Gounod, however, expresses his friendly feeling towards the committee, and intimates his willingness to negotiate on a future occasion. The Marquis of Hertford, in accepting the presidency of the Festival, expressed his intention of endeavouring to obtain the attendance of some member of the Royal Family.

The Bellecour Theatre at Lyons was burnt down on Wednesday night week, just before the performance commenced. The accident was caused by the gas jets in the flies setting fire to the canvas. The flames spread so quickly that the actors, who were dressing, had barely time to make their escape. One of the actresses, dressed as a Republic Conscript in M. Claretie's new drama, Les Muscadins, fled into the street in a shirt and the red-striped trousers of the First Republic. The losses amount to 300,000f., of which 200,000f. are covered by insurance.

The works which M. Perrin purposes bringing out this year at the Théâtre Français are as follows:—Revivals: Madame Georges Sand's Marquis de Villemer, Madame de Girardin's Lady Tartufe, and M. Labiche's Gendre de M. Poirier. New plays: M. Dumas's Etrangère, four acts; M. de Bornier's Attila, five; M. Paul Ferrier's Compensations, three; M. Lomon's Jean d'Acier, five; and M. Pailleron's Petit e Pluie, one. The rehearsals of this last have commenced, the chief parts being entrusted to Mesdames Arnould Plessis, Dinah Félix, Broisat, MM. Febre, Joilet, and Roger.

Drink and the Drama.—A letter has been published in South Wales, from Mrs Crawshay, upon "The Drama versus the Dram." Mrs Crawshay says that some time ago a local paper opened its columns to a discussion on the drama as a means of counteracting the pernicious influence of the dram. There were plenty who disputed the power of the stage to do this, but she feels more than ever convinced that this is its true and noble mission. After describing the play of All for Her, Mrs Crawshay says, "To-night I hope to enjoy this grand play for the third time. I am thankful to say we do not see the execution; but surely such a play as this, if it were possible to put it before the masses of our people, who are drinking their hearts out because they have no innocent amusements, would deter many an incipient drunkard."

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

THE MUSIC BY

J. W. DAVISON.

PRICE 4s. each.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"Two charming songs, which contrasted very favourably with the usual quality of pieces chosen by prime donne for the programmes of miscellaneous concerts, were sung by Mdme Christine Nilsson at Mr Kuhe's concert, at St James's Hall. They are by the same hand which wrote those beautiful settings of Shelley's poems, which we have frequently heard at the Monday Popular Concerts and elsewhere. The first song is entitled, 'Sweet Village Bells,' and the poem is by the late Mr Desmond Ryan; the second, 'I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden,' is a setting of Shelley's poem."—Saturday Programme.

"Mdme Nilsson was heard to great advantage in two ballads by J. W. Davison, 'I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden' and 'Sweet Village Bells'; compositions at once elegant, scholarly, and refined, and fit to be regarded as purely classical."—Standard.

"THE MAIDEN'S TEAR."

Composed by LILLIE ALBRECHT.

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"Miss Albrecht shows herself as clever a composer as she is a skilful performer, her Second Rêverie being a well designed, and excellently wrought-out Morceau de Salon, consisting of an introduction, melody, and variations. Considerable knowledge of the technicalities of the instrument is displayed in the writing, and the whole forms a most brilliant and effective solo. For scholastic purposes, as well as for public performances, the 'Maiden's Tear' will be found of great service." Sunday Times, January 10th, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht, Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, is a good and useful teaching piece, calculated only to justify its title in the case of the union of two such elements as incompetency in the pupil and irritation on the part of the master."—Morning Post, February 3rd, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. Brilliant and full of feeling, this Rêverie may take its rank with the best of Mr Sidney Smith's compositions."—Young Englishwoman, May, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. A carefully conceived and well studied composition; the composer is evidently a zealous student, and she has apparently much natural ability."—Hornet, April 28, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' by Lillie Albrecht. After the style of Brinley Richards, this drawing-room piece is brilliant without being difficult, and shows both talent and knowledge of the laws of musical composition on the part of the composer, who is, we believe, a very young lady."—The Drawing Room Gazette, June 19th, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Tear,' Second Rêverie for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. This charming piece evinces in its style throughout no small share of original talent, as well as sparkling and artistic cultivation, it being full of delicate and plaintive feeling. We have no doubt that it will be very popular, both in the concert-room and saloon."—Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, May, 1875.

"'The Maiden's Sigh' and 'The Maiden's Tear,' two reveries for the pianoforte, by Lillie Albrecht. These are both from the pen of a highly talented and proficient pianiste, and are of considerable merit. The first is a pretty little exercise, and the fingering is excellent; the second is far prettier, and as a morceau de salon has exceptional merit, whilst at the same time it is unconventional."—Public Opinion.

GRÉTRY AND SOME OF HIS WORKS.*

On Friday, the 11th February,† 1870, Zémire et Azor was performed at the Theatre, Liége, to celebrate the 129th anniversary of the birth of Grétry. The opera bears date the 16th November, 1771, so that it was then nearly a hundred years old. This is a good age, is it not? Does the reader know many musical works destined to live as long?

Every great composer has three epochs: 1. The epoch when he is the fashion; 2. The epoch when he is old fashioned (démodé); and 3. The epoch when, being altogether beyond any question of fashion, he is no longer judged by the form of isolated pieces of composition, but by the value of his ideas. Grétry has long since reached the last epoch. Referring to Zémire et Azor, the composer thus expresses himself in his Memoirs:—

"This work occupied me during the winter of 1770; it was an almost continuous source of enjoyment to me while engaged upon it, because I felt it to be, in its expression, true and vigorous at one and the same time; I even consider it would be a difficult task to combine more truth of expression, of melody, and of harmony."

The immense success of the work justified this paternal praise. In Paris and the French provinces, people would listen to nothing but Zémire et Azor, and the dogged attachment of the public for it gave rise, at Marseilles, to a horrible scene, which stained the theatre with blood. In his Essais sur la Musique, Laborde says that, when in Germany, he went to three different performances in one day, and that Zémire et Azor was played at each of them, in German, Flemish, and French, respectively. In London there was an Italian translation. The only thing added was a rondo, not by Grétry. After hearing it, the audience exclaimed, "No more of the rondo; it does not belong to the piece." The revival of Zémire et Azor on the 28th June, 1846, at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, served for the début of the tenor Jourdan, of whom Brussels retains so favourable a recollection. Adolphe Adam had touched up the score on the occasion. Several pamphlets thereupon appeared, full of rage, and anathematizing Adam, whom they branded as guilty of profanation. The last revival of the piece took place at the same theatre on the 15th September, 1862. The music, pure from any alloy, was then given in its primitive integrity. Warot obtained a great success in it.

"The score," says M. Paul de Saint-Victor, "has grown old undoubtedly, but it has done so after the fashion of fairies, without losing aught of its charms or power of fascination. Its physiognomy is somewhat faded in one or two places, but its soul, delicate and naïve, ingenuous and tender, still preserves the bloom of its youth."

"Here at least," says Berlioz, in his turn, "we have music. The characters sing; and, if in all the numbers we find, above everything, truth (as Grétry said), and correct declamation, these qualities do not prevent us from remarking some charming melodies."

But let us go back a century. Let us open La Correspondance littéraire of Grimm, and allow the celebrated critic to speak, as though on the day after the representation of the opera.

"Zémire and Azor appeared with much success at Court during the last visit to Fontainebleau; they afterwards showed themselves in the full light of publicity at Paris, on the 16th December, 1771, where they met with the same reception. A desire was expressed to see their father and mother, that is: the pit called, with loud cries, for the authors. The composer, M. Grétry, was led forward by the actors; the poet, M. Marmontel, disappeared in time to escape the honours of a theatrical ovation. I do not know why the gentleman in the pit did not do Mad. de Beaumont the honour of calling for her too. It is in her Magasin des Enfants that you may have read the charming story of La Belle et la Bête. This is the subject put on the stage by M. Marmontel, under the title of Zémire et Azor. Zémire is Beauty, and Azor, the Beast. Certain wits have said la Belle was the music, and la Bête, the words; but wits do not pride themselves on being always equitable, and such points are too easily made for us to attach any value to them."

"God has accorded to France that charming musician Grétry, but the tongue which he has the misfortune to interpret in music will never allow him to soar as high as the great masters of Italy. The Ausonian eagle, always dragging itself along by the side of the Limousin duck, will insensibly forget how to rise into the air, and will lose its power of soaring aloft. I fancy I remarked in Zémire et Azor several turns of melody after the French fashion, and these, in my opinion, augur badly. To forestall the results of these evil symptoms, M. Grétry should, from time to time, retread the road to Italy, for the purpose of refreshing there his brain and renewing his ideas; it is a misfortune for a man to be unique in his style, and the only one in his native land who can write it. There is no communication of ideas, no friction; a man expends always—continually—without ever replenishing his riches; and who can fancy himself sufficiently wealthy to stand in the long run such a drain on his resources, and guarantee himself from exhaustion?

"It is the third act which made the fortune of Zémire et Azor, and, in the third act, is the trio of the magic picture, between the father and his two remaining daughters. This trio is accompanied only by clarionets, horns, and bassoons, placed behind the magic picture, while the orchestra is silent; this is very charming, and produced a most favourable effect. I must, to satisfy my vanity, relate an anecdote in reference to this number. Wishing to learn my opinion of his work, Grétry asked me, last summer, to hear the principal airs in it. The day was fixed. He sat down at his harpsichord, and sang, without voice, after the fashion of a chapelmaster, that is to say, like an angel. He easily perceived the pleasure afforded me by most of the pieces. At the air of the magic picture, I said—as I had said at the preceding airs: 'That is charming.' But I said so in a very different tone, a tone of politeness rather than of feeling. I at first attributed to absence of mind on my part the little effect produced on me by the piece in question; but, reflecting the same evening, when at home, on the phenomenon, I thought I had discovered the cause of it. As the success of the air struck me as of the highest importance for the success of the opera, I called upon Grétry next morning, to communicate my reflections to him. He allowed me to finish, and then answered: 'I perceived very well yesterday that my trio did not please you, and that you praised it simply out of politeness. This worried me all night long, and I have employed the morning in re-writing the trio.' As he said this, he sat down at his harpsichord, and sang the piece he had composed a moment before. He had chosen my tone and made use of all my observations before he heard them. I embraced him, and said, as I left: 'I see very well that, with you, advisers get up too late. Do not touch that gem again; it will make the fortune of your work.' It was the piece of the magic picture which achieved so great a success, and which you will find in the score. It is made out of nothing.

"Grétry has a gentle and delicate physiognomy, and the pale air of a man of genius. He is an agreeable companion. He has married a young wife, with a pair of very dark eyes; a hazardous thing to do for any one with so delicate a chest as his. He is better, however, since his marriage;* and the Comte de Creuze† says 'we must glorify the Most High for it.'"

Most of Grétry's comic operas have been translated and played in Germany, England, Italy, Flanders, Holland, Sweden, Russia, &c. The Liége composer has found beyond the limits of France the success and the glory which appeared previously to be reserved exclusively for those Italian or German musicians whom Paris had attracted within its orbit. We may say that, from his time, French opera ceased to live circumscribed within the confines of the land of its birth. The subjoined letter speaks of the brilliant reception accorded to Grétry's comic operas in Italy. It is from Etienne Floquet,‡ who was travelling in that country to complete his musical studies, and is a praiseworthy and too rare example of deference on the part of a young artist towards a master:

"Florence, the 13th September, 1776.

"Monsieur Grétry,—I take advantage, Sir, of a happy and very agreeable moment to write and compliment you on the success your operas have in Italy. There has just passed through Florence a company of French actors, who have performed Lucile, Les deux

* From Le Guide Musicale.

† It was on the 8th and not the 14th February that Grétry was born, as proved by the baptismal register.

* A year previous to this, Grimm had already predicted the approaching end of Grétry, whose health was always very delicate. The composer, however, who was not then thirty, lived forty-three years longer, and was even contrary enough to bury his friend, the false prophet. The one died in 1807, and the other in 1813.

† Ambassador of Sweden at Paris, and a patron of Grétry's.

‡ Etienne Joseph Floquet, born at Aix, in Provence, the 10th May, 1750, was a musician almost unknown, and yet worthy of a better fate, for, according to M. Arthur Pougin, who devoted to him a special essay (Revue et Gazette Musicale, June, 1868), Floquet contributed to the progress of musical art in France.

Avares, and Zémire et Azor, with astonishing success. Zémire et Azor excited perfect fanaticism, although represented without scenery and by mediocre singers. You are ranked here above all other composers in the same style. The Marquis de Liquiville, a relation of the Grand Duke's, and a great contrapuntist, told me, one day that I had gone to dine with him, that a single number of Zémire et Azor was worth all the Italian comic operas written for the last thirty years. All your motives are thought charming, and your airs full of grace, expression, and the finest pathos, according to the situation. The quartet in Lucile was recommenced three times amid astonishing applause. I relate to you, Sir, things just as they have taken place. You owe a debt of thanks al signor Rutini, Chapelmaster at this Court, and a man of high merit, who conducted all the rehearsals with the same exactitude as if the works had belonged to him; and, on the days of performance, himself sat down at the harpsichord to make the orchestra go properly. Zémire et Azor is being translated into Italian, and I think that, in a little time, it will be seen on every stage in Italy. My idea is that you should insert this letter in the public papers,* in order that our dearly loved nation may be convinced that we have fine music in France, and that it is rather useless to kill one's self in having Italian operas translated, when Italy herself translates our works. Enjoy your success. They speak of you incessantly in this country, and Italy claims you as one of her children. I have nearly reached the end of my journey, which I have endeavoured to render as profitable as possible. May I, like you, Sir, continue to please my nation, and merit the suffrages of all Europe which applauds your productions. I have the honour to be, with the most perfect consideration, etc. "FLOQUET."

For three performances, 25 dols.; Leaders, 45 dols. per week. c. [Band of two.] For one or two performances, one during the day, and one in the evening, 20 dols., and the Leader 30 dols. per week. For three performances, 25 dols.; Leader, 35 dols. per week. d. [One man.] For one or two performances, one during the day and one in the evening, 25 dols. per week. For three performances, 30 dols. per week. The day performances not to exceed one hour. One hop night during the week excepted. In all cases where the German is danced, 2 dols. extra per man will be charged. Board, lodging and travelling expenses to be furnished and paid by the proprietor.

SECT. 7.—Private Parties. Weddings and Sociables, not to exceed five hours, counted from the time the music is ordered to be present, if one man is engaged, 8 dols.; two, 15 dols.; three, 22 dols. All above that number, 7 dols. per man, and double for Leader. In all cases where the German is danced, 2 dols. will be charged per man above all other charges. One dollar per man to be charged for each hour over five as above.

SECT. 8.—Concerts or Oratorios. 7 dols. including one private rehearsal; each additional rehearsal, if private, 2 dols.; if public, 3 dols. per man. A season to consist of three or more weeks, of from four to six concerts per week. For six concerts, per week, 36 dols.; for four concerts, per week, 28 dols. Military, promenade, and open air concerts, 6 dols.; if any dancing after the concert, 1 dol. extra per hour will be charged for each man. Church music, in the morning or afternoon, 7 dols. per man.

SECT. 9.—Balls. At all theatres or opera houses in New York or Brooklyn, 9 dols. All other balls, including Kraenzdrens, in the City, Brooklyn, Jersey City, or Hoboken; surprise parties and hops at armouries, engine houses, and all public halls, 7 dols., supper or no supper. All balls not to exceed eight hours, and to terminate at 5 A.M., every additional hour, 1 dol. extra per man.

SECT. 10.—Concerts and Balls given by singing societies (both on the same evening), 9 dols. per man, including one rehearsal; each additional rehearsal, 1 dol. extra per man. For playing at concert only, 6 dols. per man.

PROMENADE CONCERT.

At the Royal Italian Opera-house, on Wednesday, Signor Arditi gave a "last Gounod night." The overture to Le Medecin Malgré lui (The Mock Doctor), the Bohemian dance, from La Nonne Sanglante; an entr'acte from La Colombe; a "Saltarello;" the grand march and the new ballet music in Faust; the overture to Mireille; the ballet music, and "Marche et Cortège," from La Reine de Saba; the "Funeral March of a Marionette," and the air "La Stagione arriva" (Mireille), arranged as a solo for the ophicleide (Mr Hughes), were the instrumental, and "Ho messo nuove" (Biondina, No. 5) and "Quando a te lieta" (Faust), respectively sung by Mr Pearson and Miss Alice Fairman (the latter "encored"), were the vocal pieces. The whole formed a rich treat to the admirers of the celebrated French composer's music, who mustered in large numbers, and redemanded unanimously the "Saltarello" and "Funeral March," both of which were capitally played by the orchestra, under the experienced guidance of Signor Arditi. The second part of the programme was, as usual, miscellaneous. Mdlle Anna Mehlig played Weber's Polonaise in brilliant style, and was twice recalled. A new valse "Henriette," by C. Coote, introducing popular airs, by the accomplished composer of "The King and I," and Meyerbeer's "Royal Wedding March" (Quatrième marche aux flambeaux), composed for the marriage of the Princess Royal of England, and introducing the National Anthem, were the chief features of interest.

* It was inserted in Le Mercure de France, November, 1776.

MEFISTOFELE.

A New Italian Opera by a New Italian Composer.

To affirm to what school M. Boito belongs is a difficult matter; in strict truth, we should say that he belongs to his own school; but to give an idea nearer to truth we might add, however paradoxical it may seem to some people, that he stays between the Puritani of Bellini, the Lohengrin of Wagner, and the music of Chopin. He has, of the first, the delicacy of sentiment, and the calm serenity; of the second, the efficacy and strength of the symphonical descriptive element; of the last, the elegance and ideality. Never too obsequious to form, he is not even obsequious to the independence of form—he follows a logical train of thought. Where the situation requires a recitative, he makes a recitative; where it requires a melody, a melody; where a dialogue, a dialogue; where a concerted piece, a concerted piece: thus the exigences of the development of the drama determine the various forms of the poetry, and the forms of the poetry determine the form, kind, and succession of the musical pieces. The melody is abundant, easy, spontaneous, and new; melody, the source of which was thought to be dried up with the death of Bellini. Except two phrases in the fourth act, which are taken from an adagio of Beethoven, in the whole opera there are no reminiscences of any other musical work: and in all this novelty there is nothing abstruse to seek consideration as an original writer, nothing that thwarts the beautiful, under a pretext of following the real. When he seeks his melodies, M. Boito does not certainly consult the piano; he consults his mind, his heart, and the inward essence of the idea that is to be set to music. Thence he takes the beautiful, the spontaneity and the novelty; for every poetical thought, if we listen attentively, has its own melody.

The instrumental parts also follow the exigences of the drama, which is developing on the stage, now being reduced to a simple accompaniment, now having the advantage of a fantastic element.

As we are writing for persons who were not present at the performance of the opera, and have not the melodrama before them, it would be superfluous to give a particular examination of the pieces; therefore we shall briefly talk of the various characters the music assumes in the principal pieces.

The first part, which, as was said, is the Prologue in Heaven, is, perhaps, the best in the opera; not because the author has worked for it with more vigour than for other parts, nor because the thoughts rose more easily in his mind; but because the poetic conception is so high, that the music following it is naturally as superior to the other parts as is superior the ideality of the poetic conception. The author gave this first part the design of the classical symphony, and added to it the chorus. It begins by the sound of seven trumpets, and the booming of seven thunders, upon which follows an adagio, paradoxical indeed—that is the praises of God, sung by the celestial phalanxes. When the chorus is finishing, and the echoes are still representing the last notes, Mephisto appears. The piece of the wager, though it contains a clear melody, is yet opportunely dominated by counterpoint and recitative; as the wager is laid, a brief "Sanctus" rises, and then the singing of the flying seraphims—a chorus of boys. Here M. Boito found a wonderful effect in the approaching and withdrawing of the flying band, by beginning the chorus with a single note, which is repeated very softly at first, and then loudly, and then softly again, and loudly again, whilst the orchestra gives only some long notes from the string instruments. The following song of the seraphims constitutes the scherzo of the symphony, and finishes again by the repeated note, which vanishes little by little in the distance. At this point arises from the earth the "Salve Regina" of the penitent woman—a grave, imposing melody, accompanied by the organ. The celestial phalanxes join their prayers to those that rise from the earth; then the orchestra adds by little and little, from the extreme heavens; the angels return, flying, with their pretty singing, the sonority grows more and more, till, after an admirable and very striking progression, all the phalanxes, angels and archangels, burst out into the great adagio, by which, in the beginning, the phalanxes sang the praises of God; and among new sounds and thunders the grand piece finishes. If not present at the acting of this piece, it would be impossible for us to imagine the impression it produces; for it would be vain to seek in other authors anything that resembles it; and Schumann, who set the Apotheosis of Faust to music, did it on a different plan, so that there is no analogy between it and the Prologue of Mefistofele.

The desire of demonstrating the musical development that M. Boito has given to the other parts would carry us to tire out the patience of those who may read this correspondence; therefore we are obliged to indicate shortly the remaining parts, in which, if there is less ideality, because the action does not require it, there is, however, no less passion, elegance, and efficacy of descriptive power.

The walk at Frankfort is full of gaiety, with the sound of the bells, on which the chorus makes cadence. The music of the Ostertag is elegant and imposing—the situation where the grey monk—which M. Boito, according to the legend, substitutes for the spaniel—approaches Faust, closing him in an invisible circle. Another part equal to the Prologue, but on a different ground, is the Romantic Sabbath. In the Prologue there is the sublimity, in this Sabbath the honour; there the ecstacy, here the terror. The chorus of witches and sorcerers climbing on the steep rocks, and the tumultuous dance, by which it finishes, are fit for the ridges of Brocken.

PESTH.

(From a Correspondent.)

An appeal has been made to the public in favour of the two daughters of the Roman patrician, Polcelli, pupil of Haydn's, and, for a long period, conductor of Prince Esterhazy's musical establishment. One of the daughters, grand-daughter of the composer of the Seasons, is in a state of the greatest indigence. In this extremity, she has announced her wish to sell the last relics of Haydn—namely, a gold watch, with his name engraved on the case; a violin by Antonio Stradazio, of Cremona (1608), on which Haydn frequently played; and a collection of his manuscripts and letters.

TO DISHLEY PETERS, ESQ.

Sir,—It seems to me that the return of the Doctors to the Musical World has not been sufficiently appreciated. Personally I have been so pleased to see them back that I have composed a small poem, in three verses, on the subject. I have only written out the last line of each verse, and for two reasons.—Firstly, because anybody reading the poem can fill in the other lines as strongly as they please; lastly, because I can only think of one rhyme to Doctors, and that is Procters, which could scarcely be used right through the poem:—

— — — — —
— — — — —
— — — — —
To welcome back the Doctors.

2.

— — — — —
— — — — —
— — — — —
Back came the glorious Doctors.

— — — — —
— — — — —
— — — — —
That brought us back our Doctors.

Isaac Cunning'm Griffin.

[Other Doctors have packed up portmanteau, but cannot resume office until C. L. has taken their portraits. Mr Griffin's verses are adumbrous, vague, and oversketchy—too many lines in each verse by three. We prefer those of Augustus Mayhew, Esq.:—

"Good gods! what a beautiful night,
I never saw anything similar."

But that is matter of pre-conviction.—D. P.]

ENGLISH ARTISTS DRAWN BY A COMPATRIOT.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Much as one usually desires to encourage the recent development of musical art in this country, yet it can hardly be a wise course to shut one's eyes wilfully to obvious defects, and to try and take credit for merits that we do not possess.

There is plenty of musical talent and plenty of good voices to be found in this country, and our native professional singers need never really be ashamed of competing with foreigners if they would only study their art in a more artistic spirit, and cease to pander for the applause of those who regard the merit of a singer in proportion to the vigour with which he or she can deliver a prolonged high note at the conclusion of a song. A tenor may make a great effect upon a native audience by the possession of one thoroughly-good, moderately-high, and sensationally-effective note in his voice; and a singer who is fortunate enough to possess three or four good notes can, by selecting songs requiring a frequent repetition of these notes and admitting of "slurring" over the weaker notes in his voice, make a very successful effect. I have heard many singers meander through three or four verses of a popular ballad very ineffectively; but who, reserving their energy for the effective note at the close, and prolonging this note with painful determination, have gained a storm of applause —one good round; on the strength of this, they have ventured upon a repetition of the dose, and successfully saddled a weak-minded audience with an apparently intentional encore. Reporters notice the fact of an encore. In time, a singer's fame is made; no one exactly knows how; but people hear that Miss So-and-So is a very good singer—"always gets encored, you know." A "very good singer," whose voice, if carefully tested, would reveal, perhaps, four moderately good and certainly effective notes, and the rest not notes at all.

Undoubtedly the cause of all this is the insane desire of an uncritical public for bravura singing. We constantly hear effective ballads utterly spoiled by being rendered in this melodramatic style; and it is remarkable how similar are the endings of nine songs out of every ten—generally springing from a crotchet, jumping over a quaver, on to a high breve, prolonged ad libitum. Sometimes the effect of these vocal gymnastics is enhanced by a throwing back of the head, a dilation of the form, and a defiant wave of the arm. In the face of the really good singing we can hear, it is surprising that so much of this kind of thing goes down; it is only a proof that "palpable effect" exercises a greater influence upon an average audience than quiet, unforced excellence. Art has a great attraction for many who never think. Thought is required to appreciate drama. Melodrama is more popular because, no doubt, it gives a transient pleasure to the spectator, without troubling his mental complacency.

Passing from the platform to the stage, I find English singers in a still worse plight, though hardly worse than their Italian confrères. It is only on the French stage, I fancy, that we find an artistic rendering of the lyric drama. Those who remember Schneider and company, at the Princess's, and M. Humbert's company in Mdme Angot, at the Criterion, will understand what I mean. There, in bouffe, which in England is buffoonery, I found true art. The minute detail, the exquisite finish, the utter absence of all conciousness of an audience, or of appealing for applause, by vocal tours de force.

What a lesson for all English vocalists was Mario Widmer's rendering of the ballad to Clairette. No standing over the foot-lights, no forcing of effective notes; but an artistic, dramatic rendering of a dramatic song like a musical soliloquy. Then the perfection of the ensemble, the art of Mdlle Delorme, Mdlle Luigini, Mdlle Raphael as Lange—a delicate character vulgarized on the English stage. It is in dealing with difficult characters of this sort that the true artist is revealed. Mdlle Raphael was the true artist. Art must pourtray, but never revolt. Lange was there. She was not inviting, but she was not offensive. Then the valse at the end of the second act. Real dancing. How many of our actors and actresses can really dance?

Opéra bouffe in English is an abomination. In French it is art—not high art, perhaps; but positively art—true art. The only kind of musical pieces which are really artistic, on the English stage, are to be found at the Strand. There is a company of artists, and their fun is real and never vulgar. Flamingo is very funny.

Another feature of the Humbert Company was the band. Seldom have I heard such a delicious orchestra—small, but true, well proportioned, and working as one man. In England, it appears to be forgotten that musical strength does not make an orchestra, nor the possession of great individual instrumentalists. If the members of an orchestra have not been accustomed to play together, be they the greatest living musicians, they will fail in effect. The main features of an English orchestra are: coarseness of execution, utter absence of delicate light and shade, bad proportion of instrumental selection, causing a disagreeable brassiness, and the astonishing vigour displayed by the individual who presides over the big drum and the cymbals, and who seems impelled by an earnest, but scarcely laudable desire, to demonstrate the superiority of noise over music. One of the most charming little orchestras I ever enjoyed hearing is the Reyloffs' orchestra at the Brighton Aquarium, which is remarkable for delicacy of tone and expression, and correctness and finish of execution.

TIETJENS AT BOSTON.

(From the "Boston Daily Advertiser," Oct. 21st.)

The past fortnight has been freighted with rich gifts for lovers of music in Boston; and the extraordinary course of the season now brings it to pass that one of the very greatest of living pianists is followed by a singer, who, for many years, was acknowledged to be without a superior in Europe. Mdlle Tietjens sang last night, in the Music Hall, to a large audience, and achieved a substantial and unquestionable triumph. It is impossible that she should not delight the public, for her art is of that finished sort which commands the admiration of the connoisseur, while it is inspired by a fulness of feeling which communicates itself to every sensitive heart. Mdlle Tietjens is more like Parepa-Rosa than any other artiste who ever visited this city. Such epithets as "magnificent" and "splendid," so often misapplied, find truthful exemplification in Mdlle Tietjens' singing. Her vocalization is as perfect as need be, but it seldom calls attention to itself; her phrasing is unsurpassed in majestic force and vitality, and her dramatic and expressive power has seldom been equalled. No one need be apprehensive, either, about the present character of the artiste's voice. Of immense volume, power and resonance, full, rich, and sweet, this voice is one which gives itself with absolute sensitiveness to the control of the directing spirit.

The pieces assigned to Mdlle Tietjens last evening were three in number, viz.:—a "Grand Valse," by Arditi; Gounod's "Ave Maria," and the aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from Weber's Oberon. Their importance is the exact reverse of the order given them on the programme. The aria from Weber's enchanting opera is a masterpiece, and its delivery has long been recognised as an experimentum crucis for the singer, a union of the loftiest and most varied dramatic ability with great fulness and flexibility of voice, physical power and complete vocal culture. Mdlle Tietjens' delivery lacked in nothing, and was positively affluent and overflowing in its expressive and vocal wealth. Every phase of thought in the elaborate description of the ocean's many moods was followed with that absolute ease and graphic certainty which show the working of great dramatic genius; and, after an exact delineation of the moment of agonising fear which comes to the shipwrecked Reiza, the final burst of joy and rapture at the prospect of safety and re-union with her lover was given with electric and irresistible power. The artist was thrice recalled, and on two occasions gratified the demand for an encore, repeating a portion of the "Valse," and giving "Home, sweet home" with entire simplicity, but with searching and tender expression. Fame has, indeed, told no more than the truth about Mdlle Tietjens; and we trust that the patronage given to her concerts in Boston will do ourselves and her grand talents something approaching justice. However enthusiastic our public is, it will not be likely to be too extravagant.

HOME MUSIC—AS IT IS, AND AS IT MIGHT BE.

(From the "Leisure Hour.")

I.

The dictionary defines music as "the science of combining sounds in an agreeable manner,—vocal or instrumental harmony;" in private life, however, the word has a far more limited application. While Jones's daughter tells us that she learns music, we are not to understand that she is taking lessons on the harp, or in singing, or in harmony and counterpoint, but that she is devoting her attention to the study of the pianoforte, which has contrived of late years entirely to monopolize the term. In fact, to most Englishmen the word music simply calls up a vision of a grand or a square, with a morning governess, a tuner, a music-stool, and finishing lessons at two guineas a quarter; while at the very mention of the word their ears are filled with scales in C major, and arrangements of "The Last Rose of Summer," mingled in wild confusion with five-finger exercises, and the daily studies of Czerny and Bertini.

Notwithstanding that every English girl undergoes a more or less extensive, and expensive, training on the pianoforte, it can hardly be said that English domestic music is improving, or even that it is so good as it was before the omnipresent instrument was invented; on the contrary, it may be fairly argued that the pianoforte has really been the indirect cause of the decline and fall of music as a welcome home recreation. We appeal to our readers: Where the pianoforte exists, is there not much more practising (this word has also acquired a sense of its own) than playing? When a piece (also in a technical sense) is ready for performance in the family circle, does it not always fall flat and stale on the ears of those whose fate it has been to hear the weeks of thumping that have preceded its final consummation?

The question will arise, What has brought the piano into such prominence in English domestic life? The reason is this: in the first place it forms a most convenient accompaniment for solo songs, one of the positions it fills to the best advantage; in the next place, a whole tune, by which we mean an air completely harmonized, may be produced by one person on one instrument; while, thirdly and chiefly, nearly every one, persons possessed of little, or even absolutely devoid of any musical taste, may, by dint of practice, play a tune passably, provided that it requires no more expression than can be produced by a judicious use of the right-hand pedal. Besides, owing to the facility of the execution in certain combinations—for instance, common chords arpeggioed in rapid notes—an air may be arranged so as to be at once brilliant, or what is so-called, and yet tolerably easy. Accordingly, a demand, and, we are sorry to add, an unfailing supply of these jingling, expressionless pieces is created, and thus it is that washy opera airs, set in ornamental filigrees of demisemiquavers, common waltz tunes in the form of Morceaux Brillants pour Salon, and tortured versions of the "Bluebells of Scotland," disguised as Grandes fantaisies sur un theme Ecossais, are poured forth on the unresisting world for the sake of girls who, possessed of the digital dexterity requisite for their performance, and nothing more, believe that in playing them they are making music, and entertaining their fellow-creatures.

When a girl has received her early training in a school like this, she finds it almost impossible to adopt a more rational style. Not only is the taste vitiated, but the left hand, which has been comparatively untrained, will either be physically unable to execute the bass part in the sonatas of Beethoven, or will drop from the keyboard, tired out, before the middle of the first movement. The effect so easily procured by merely mechanical means in the pieces of the day cannot be obtained in the works of the great masters without a sympathetic mind and a cultivated taste; in short, the soul must play as well as the fingers. How absolutely painful it is to hear a player nourished on the ordinary boarding-school pieces attempt an adagio of Beethoven, notably that which commences his "Moonlight Sonata" (No. 14). She will carefully give each triplet its exact metronome time, play steadily, calmly, and cold-bloodedly (if the term may be used), through to the end, with no passion, with no expression; and then wonder, as well she may, what people can ever find to admire in classical music. The consequence is that fathers, brothers, and other relations—except, perhaps, the admiring mamma, who has resolved that all her daughters, whether musically inclined or not, shall be possessed of the accomplishment—wearied by the horrible sameness attending every performance, never ask for a tune, and stealthily retire from the room if they perceive the signs of an impending encounter with the much-enduring instrument.

With the piano the accompanied ballad has grown up, and here, too, a supply of the most inferior trash is produced, usurping the place of the old glees, catches, canons, and rounds, which, not long ago, might be heard in every house in the country. The part-song still finds its votaries among the choral societies, but at home the alto, tenor, and bass would feel that they were being eclipsed by the soprano, were they to take the trouble to get up a part in "Crabbed Age and Youth," or "Down in a Flowery Dale." Alto, tenor, and bass ballads may be had, and the poorer the singer, the readier to show off in a solo. Thus we find the tenor revelling in the mawkish sentiment of "Kiss me, mother, ere I leave thee, nevermore to meet again," or an almost voiceless bass attempting the jubilant strains of "Oh, gay is the life of a brigand bold," with perhaps a shake on the last note but one. How is it, by the way, that the untrained amateur always does try to shake?

When a glee is attempted, the great aim seems to be to stand up and sing something. It matters not that there is no tenor present, that there are five basses and six sopranos, but only one alto; that some are not only unable to sing from music, but have never seen the glee before. Some Vandal, voiceless baritone smoothes all these difficulties with "Oh, Miss B—— will play the accompaniment, you know, and it will be all right;" the performers shout it through somehow, wandering into each other's parts, and think themselves perfect if they come in more or less together at the end, and then usually blandly encore themselves with "Let's have another try, and mind the marks of expression." The custom of publishing accompaniments to glees that were never intended to be sung with them cannot be too highly reprobated as a concession to the low ebb of modern vocal culture.

What a loss is the art of glee-singing when the time for pic-nics arrives! The pianoforte is impracticable, the guitar no longer studied, and the banjo prohibited in polite society. Solo songs are thus for the most part unavailable. Concerted vocal music always sounds delicious under the canopy of heaven; those only who have heard Mendelssohn's beautiful open-air songs can imagine the delight and pleasure they furnish at a summer out-of-door gathering; but, thanks to the rise of the ruthless piano, that lovely pic-nic music, for so it may be called, is a sealed book to all but a very few. Its place is probably taken by a song, volunteered by the humorous man of the company with what he facetiously styles a corious, in which the company, on his invitation, join in unison.

It will be admitted that domestic music is generally looked upon at best as a mere pastime, taken up to fill an idle moment, or as an agreeable supplement to the conversation at the stately evening party of middle-class society, and from this view of the subject some awkward mistakes are likely to occur. The writer well remembers being present some years ago at a friend's house where it was customary for a few amateurs to meet for the sake of performing and listening to good classical music. On the evening in question, two friends of the host, but strangers to the rest of the company, were present, and under the above erroneous impression as to the use of "the divine art," annoyed everyone by carrying on a vehement political debate during the first movement of a quintet of Mozart's. At the conclusion of the allegro, they were politely asked by the host if they did not find the room too hot, and if they would not like to walk in the garden, but replied no; they preferred to listen to the music, which was accordingly finished with an obbligato political accompaniment. In the next piece, however, which was a solo sonata of Beethoven's, they discovered their mistake. They endeavoured to continue their conversation with the string players, who were now at liberty; but, finding that their queries were met by whispered answers, while their observations were left unresponded to, at last realized the position, and for the remainder of the evening formed a most decorous, if not an appreciative audience.

EDWARD REMÉNYI.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Hungarian violinist, M. Edward Reményi, gave a concert here last Tuesday, of which I include the programme. As M. Reményi intends to visit England shortly, it may interest you to hear a few remarks about him. A mere glance at the programme will show you that he is either a fool or a first-rate musician. I am glad to say that he is the latter in every respect. His execution is faultless, his technique infallible, and he has a wonderful way of entering into a composer's spirit. He seems to become another, according to the music he is playing. I hope he may have as much success in England as he has had here.

DEAN, CHAPTER, ORGANIST, AND VICAR CHORAL.

Music does not seem to be the "food of love" in the West country even when it is associated with the "Gospel of Peace." What one of the local journals terms "a strange epidemic" has broken out among the quiet Somersetshire towns, three of which, as well as the Cathedral city of Wells, are more or less disturbed about matters appertaining to the service of song. A few weeks ago the Bishop of the diocese, with Lord Selborne as his assessor, sat in judgment upon a dispute between the Dean and Chapter on the one part and the College of Vicars Choral on the other—those bodies, instead of dwelling together in unity, having fallen out respecting the right of the Chapter to nominate members of the College. Peace being made, or, at any rate, a truce agreed upon, in this case, the parish churches caught the infection, and are now suffering grievously. Sherborne has its musico-religious quarrel, which seems, however, to be based more upon personal than public grounds. The organist, attacked, as he alleges, by illness, thought proper to reside out of the town—a step which led to high words between him and the vicar, and, in consequence of his refusal to apologise for certain expressions, to resign when called upon, the Vestry have now given the musical official three months' notice to quit. This is, no doubt, a paltry case unworthy attention of itself, but it is significant as one of a group. Turning to Crewkerne, we find that parish completely "by the ears," upon the double question as to what the musical service should be and who possesses the legal right to direct its performance. On one side stands the vicar, and on the other a large section of the inhabitants, between whom the fight rages hotly enough to justify the local boast about "plucky Crewkerne." The incumbent, it appears, sets his face against "services" and anthems rendered by a choir, and wishes to have plain chants and tunes sung by the people. This system, which the opposite side calls "congregational foolery," he endeavoured to establish; whereupon the choir resigned, and left the music of the church to "the squall of school children and the howl of a select few admirers of discord." Then the organist retired in disgust, and the parishioners held a meeting to talk the matter over, upon which they seem to have resolved that the new organist, if a vicar's man, shall be paid by the vicar. The case on their side is now before the Ordinary, pending whose decision congratulation prevails that "plucky Crewkerne" is not to be alarmed by the "futile flaunting of a parson's surplice." At Yeovil matters are in still worse case. Almost the last suit decided by the now defunct court of Arches was one instituted by the vicar of this parish to restrain his organist from performing voluntaries before and after service. Sir Robert Phillimore gave judgment in favour of the clerical pretension to regulate a matter in which, one might suppose, only perversity could see materials for dispute; but Yeovil, which supports the organist, is not at all disposed to tame submission. The vicar will not recognize the organist, and the parishioners, whose paid officer the musician is, sustain him at his post. Under these conditions of dead-lock a compromise was suggested—the organ to be played by a substitute during the vicar's absence for a year, without prejudice to the interests of either party. But the Yeovil men were stern, and resolved that the organist, their servant, should remain at his instrument and do his duty. So the matter stands; and now may we ask why this epidemic of disorder is sweeping over the erstwhile peaceful Somersetshire parishes? A Scottish Presbyterian would perhaps see in it a judgment upon those who use a "kist of whistles," and praise the Lord by machinery. Others may regard it as significant of the turmoil and distraction prevailing within the National Church, consequent upon clerical assumptions. But, whatever the cause, it is earnestly to be hoped that if the angry passions of Somerset churchmen must arise, they will find vent in other matters than that part of religious service which is specially suggestive of union and concord.

PARIS SCRAPS.

(From our Parisian Scrapper.)

At the Grand Opera, Madlle de Reszké has appeared successfully as Marguerite in M. Gounod's Faust. Coming after so great a favourite as Mad. Carvalho in the part, the young lady's task was not an easy one, but she acquitted herself in a satisfactory manner. She was especially happy in the Garden Scene.

A new tenor, M. Stéphanne, has come out, at the Opéra-Comique, the opera selected for his appearance being Haydée. His voice is fresh and agreeable; his personal appearance prepossessing. He would, however, have acted wisely, had he studied a little longer before making his bow to the public. His vocal training can scarcely be designated complete. He was well received.

Le Pompon, M. Lecocq's new opera, at the Folies Dramatiques, is highly praised by all lovers of good comic music. Among the most noticeable pieces are the duet: "L'Amour est une pure flamme" the "Sicilienne" and Piccolo's couplets. The principal characters are entrusted to Madlle Caillot, Mad. Matz-Ferrare, MM. Lucco, Didier, and Milher.

The Committee formed to decide upon M. Adolphe Sax's plan for a monster operahouse have met and deliberated under the presidency of M. Emile de Girardin. In the course of the proceedings, the following letter was read. It was addressed to M. L. Détroyat, one of the chief movers in the business.

"4th November—Saint Charles (My Saint's Day).

"My dear Détroyat,—You are aware of the accident which will keep me a captive at home for a long time to come, and, consequently, prevent my responding to your summons. Still, as I have one hand tolerably free, I think I shall be acting rightly, and making up as much as possible for my forced absence, by sending you these few lines, which I beg you and your honourable colleagues to receive as the simple enunciation of the principal points to which, it strikes me, we should confine ourselves in the question about to occupy our attention.

"1. NOTHING COLOSSAL. This is DEATH to musical art, especially in a theatre, where too great a distance between the singer and his hearers destroys all physiognomy and all interest, reducing the singer to the necessity of exhausting himself in emptiness.

"2. We should not establish a lyric theatre, but re-establish the Lyric Theatre, that is to say: the Normal School where, by contact with the public and by personal experience, we may produce and form the young composers from among whom our grand lyric theatres may every day obtain recruits to maintain and perpetuate, in a national repertory worthily kept up, the honour of French music. It should be a sort of Salon whence the authors should rise to the Musée. "CH. GOUNOD."

M. Camille Doucet, in the name of the Dramatic Authors, and M. Carvalho strongly supported M. Ch. Gounod's opinion, as M. Ambroise Thomas had previously done. The same view was taken by MM. Halanzier and Victorien Joncières.

M. Emile de Girardin observed that the meeting had not been convened to take into consideration the question of the Théâtre-Lyrique, a question which would speedily receive a most satisfactory solution. The object was to discuss the feasibility of erecting a popular Operahouse of vast dimensions, where grand classical and modern works might, by low prices, be brought within the reach of the great masses. M. Adolphe Sax then explained his plan, which, however, was rejected in favour of another submitted to the Committee by MM. Davioud and Bourdais, and already approved by the Municipality of Paris, who probably will grant these gentlemen a plot of ground in the Place of the Château d'Eau, on which to build their theatre, which is designed to accommodate 9,000 persons.

M. Adolphe Sax's proposed popular Operahouse was to have been in the form of a giant-egg. I am afraid that, like the celebrated Humpty-Dumpty, of mural celebrity, that egg is irrevocably smashed.

ACORNS, SLOES, AND BLACKBERRIES.

By Gibbs Gibb Gibbs, Esq.

No. 19.

Thomas Morley, a pupil of Bird, bachelor of music, and one of the gentlemen of Queen Elizabeth's chapel, acquired some celebrity by his treatise entitled "A plane and easie Introduction to Practical Musicke." His burial service is supposed to be the first that was composed after the Reformation. This service was performed, in the year 1760, by the united choirs of Westminster, St Paul's, and the Chapel Royal, at the funeral of George II. Dr Boyce, in his collection of cathedral music, in which the whole service is printed, speaks of the beauties of this work. Morley is supposed to have died about 1604.

St Nicetius, or Nicetas, is said by Dr Forkell, in the second volume of his history, p. 197, to be the real author of the hymn Te Deum laudamus, commonly ascribed to Ambrosius.

Orpheus.—It is the opinion of some eminent philologers of later times that there never was any such person as Orpheus, except in Fairyland, and that his whole history was nothing but a mere romantic allegory, utterly devoid of truth and reality. But there is nothing alleged for this opinion from antiquity, except the one passage of Cicero concerning Aristotle, who seems to have meant no more than this, that there was no such person as Orpheus anterior to Homer, or that the verses vulgarly called Orphical were not written by Orpheus. However, if it should be granted that Aristotle had denied the existence of such a man, their seems to be no reason why his single testimony should preponderate against the universal consent of all antiquity, which agrees that Orpheus was the son of Œager, by birth a Thracian, the father, or chief founder, of the mythological and allegorical theology amongst the Greeks, and of all their most sacred rites and mysteries, who is commonly supposed to have lived before the Trojan war, that is in the time of the Israelitish judges; or, at least, to have been senior both to Hesiod and Homer, and to have died a violent death, most affirming that he was torn in pieces by women. For which reason, in the vision of Herus Pamphylius, in Plato, Orpheus's soul, passing into another body, is said to have chosen that of a swan, a reputed musical animal, on account of the great hatred he had conceived for all women, from the death which they had inflicted on him. And the historic truth of Orpheus was not only acknowledged by Plato, but also by Isocrates, who lived before Aristotle, in his oration in praise of Busiris, and confirmed by the grave historian Diodorus Siculus, who says, that Orpheus diligently applied himself to literature, and, when he had learned the mythological part of theology, travelled into Egypt, where he soon became the greatest proficient among the Greeks in the mysteries of religion, theology, and poetry. Neither was this history of Orpheus contradicted by Origen, when so justly provoked by Celsus, who had preferred him to our Saviour; and, according to Suidas, Orpheus the Thracian was the first inventor of the religious mysteries of the Greeks, and that religion was thence called Thereskeia, as it was a Thracian invention. On account of the great antiquity of Orpheus, there have been numberless fables intermingled with his history, yet there appears to be no reason why we should disbelive the existence of such a man.

HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

IT was with unmixed satisfaction that we read the following in the last issue of that wide and widely-circulated midland sheet, the Hereford Times:—

"We are permitted to state that at the Annual Audit Dinner the Dean of Hereford availed himself of the opportunity to express his views on the subject of the Musical Festivals. As has been already announced, the Dean and Chapter have granted the use of the Cathedral in 1876, as in former years; and it did not need this act of simple justice and common sense to confirm Dean Herbert in the respect of the citizens. Indeed, the permission to continue the Festivals on the old footing embodies the unanimous decision of the Dean and Chapter. None the less, the words of the Dean on Thursday evening—words of wisdom and force, yet expressed in the most tolerant and kindly spirit—will commend themselves to the approval of the country. The Dean said that, although the recent Worcester Festival had been a financial success, still he doubted whether it would be as successful in future years, when the excitement and emulation of recent opposition would have departed, and when the money raised for charitable purposes would be in proportion to the popularity of the Festivals. We rejoice that the Dean and Chapter follow in the footsteps of the good men who have preceded them in this diocese, and that a great charitable and religious movement is still to be helped and distinguished by the adequate rendering of some of the grandest musical and devotional conceptions of the human mind. The conduct of the Dean and Chapter will be approved generally throughout the country."

In this manner have the Dean and Chapter of little independent Hereford declared their entire want of sympathy with bigoted intolerance. We respect them for it; and countless others will join in the homage we thus willingly pay. The so-called "Festival" this year at Worcester was a mere farce; an attempt to promote sermons and homilies at the expense of music, which should ever be an important element in the highest manifestations of worship. It is to be hoped that Gloucester, in 1877, will follow the example of Hereford in 1876. The "financial success" of the meeting at Worcester is readily explained, inasmuch as there was very little expenditure, and as, like the hundred bouquets thrown at a prima donna, it was organised in advance.

"REMEMBER, my Lord," said Henry VIII. to the indignant nobleman, whom Holbein had kicked down stairs, and who, not satisfied with the offer of an apology, desired nothing less than the execution of the offending artist, "remember that I can, whenever I please, make seven Lords out of seven ploughmen, but I cannot make one Holbein of even seven Lords." Had the occasion rendered more ample explanation necessary or advisable, there is no doubt the burly patron of the Divorce Court in that age would have gone further, and owned he could not make one Holbein out of the whole Peerage. As for performing such a feat with ploughmen as material to work upon, the notion would have seemed as preposterous as the idea of effecting it through the medium of an unlimited supply of Englishmen of any class, with whom to experimentalise. In those days, no one ever thought of an Englishman's becoming a painter. So, Bluff King Hal, as the marrying monarch is termed, patronised Holbein, who, despite the Lord he had shown to the street door in such summary fashion, went on, as theretofore, painting away with his left hand, until he fell a victim to the plague in 1554. Though differing in many respects from the uxorious Tudor tyrant, Charles I. evidently shared his non-belief in Englishmen as painters, and numerous works by Peter Paul Rubens, scholar, statesman, ambassador, and artist, who received the honour of knighthood from his Majesty, exist to attest the fact. Another witness in the same cause is Anthony Vandyck, also an English knight. Then, again, it was Sir Peter Lely, who painted the Duchess of Richmond, Mrs Eleanor Gwynne, the Countess of Rochester, Lady Middleton, Lady Whitmore, Lady Denham, and a host of other fair ones, more celebrated for beauty and wit than for virtue and morality. To the foregoing adepts with palette and brush must be added Sir Godfrey Kneller, the favourite of Charles II., James II., William III., and George I., knighted by William and created a baronet by George. The list might be augmented by many other names of less note, tending to show that pictorial art was represented here almost exclusively by foreigners. England could not produce painters. Such was, in those days, the general belief both at home and abroad. At length, in 1768, the Royal Academy was founded. In what high estimation our English School of Painting is now held, or by what great men it has been illustrated, our readers need not be informed.

We have noticed the delusion about the incompetency of Englishmen as painters, because it throws an instructive light upon another hallucination, that, namely, affecting the sister art of Music. England—so, until recently, ran the parrot-cry—was not a musical nation. Nay; not only was England not a musical nation, but Englishmen seemed determined that she never should become one. As the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone remarked in the speech recently delivered by him in the Lecture Hall, at Greenwich, when distributing the prizes to the successful students of the Science and Art Classes, a person was laughed at who contended, fifty years ago, that human beings—including, of course, the inhabitants of these islands—were, as such, musical. People used to say: "I can't tell one note from another, and I don't care a bit about Music." And woe to him who did care about it, and who endeavoured to obtain proficiency in it. While Louis XIV., by an express decree, announced that members of the French nobility might appear on the boards of the Grand Opera without derogating a tittle from their high estate, we find that heartless, frigid, aristocratic prig, the Earl of Chesterfield, contemptuously warning his son against fiddling and fiddlers. For a period verging upon a couple of centuries, our forefathers considered that the study of music, like the confection of Biblical pictures in worsted, or the manufacture of pickles, preserves, and cordials, ought to be restricted to their wives and daughters. Any son of theirs who manifested a predilection for it was ridiculed as a mollycoddle. It is true that country squires in their old family-houses, or Town gallants at their taverns, were not averse to indulging in hunting songs, or political catches, but they insisted on doing so without the aid of art. Just as the upholders of the old state of things in more modern times declared that the British Officer would hopelessly deteriorate if taught to perform properly the very duties he was expected to perform, and that his courage would diminish in the exact ratio that his knowledge was increased; so their predecessors in prejudice appeared to entertain the belief that their voices would be irretrievably ruined if they were instructed how to use them. This fact was the more remarkable because the example set them at a previous epoch of our history was there to teach them better. In the reign of Elizabeth, when England was famous for every thing which renders a nation great and respected; when her statesmen were renowned throughout Europe; when her soldiers and her sailors made Victory carry the national standard before them; and when the glorious list of her poets was headed by the name of Shakespeare, the cultivation of Music formed part of every man's education, and few among the higher classes would have boasted that they did not care a pin about it, or tell one note from another.

Many of us may still entertain grave doubts as to the advisability of the course pursued by Mr Gladstone when he disestablished the Protestant Church in Ireland; others, hurried away by patriotic impetuosity, may, like the Duke of Beaufort, at the Bristol gathering recently, consider that the ex-Premier ought to be impaled for allowing Russia to tamper with the treaty of Paris; but most of us will heartily agree with what fell from his lips on the subject of Music and the remarkable impetus given to it of late years. At our Universities, at our great public seminaries, and in our private schools, the rights—we use the word advisedly—the rights, we repeat, of Music are beginning to be recognized, and in such matters ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte. That first step has now been taken, and a pretty long step it is, closely resembling a stride of the celebrated Seven-League Boots in the nursery-tale. Not merely, too, have our Universities and Schools "begun it," like the kettle of which Charles Dickens wrote, but other agents have continued the task. As Mr Gladstone said—"The public mind is becoming more and more habituated to the teaching of Music; and, of course, the universal teaching of Music implies the universal practice of it, in one shape or other." It is for this object, namely: the universal practice of Music, that a small number of conscientious and determined men have toiled long and undauntedly in this country through good report and ill report, turning neither to the right nor to the left. Not, though, for the practice of Music "in one shape or other," but in the best shape. How successful they have been is demonstrated by more than the mere spread of Music among those to whom the art was unknown; it is shown by the purer and more classical taste exhibited by those who cultivated it previously. Rewarded by the consciousness of what they have already achieved, let these brave pioneers, who have opened up and made easy one of the most pleasant and most beautiful paths by which Civilization is advancing to her sublime goal, exert themselves with even more vigour than before. When they find that a public man, holding such a position as the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, enunciates the principle which they have ever maintained, and for which they have ever worked, that "Music is a general inheritance; that the faculty of Music is a common faculty of the people forming an intelligent community," they have, indeed, good grounds for hope, and never in this country did the prospects of Music, appear more bright and more cheering than now.—R. K.

"Implens affectas tacita dulcedine mentes,"

CHRISTINE NILSSON IN THE TROVATORE.

(From the "Liverpool Courier.")

The combined attraction of Mdme Christine Nilsson and Mdme Trebelli in Verdi's ever popular Trovatore filled the house to its utmost capacity. Every seat was let, and vast numbers were unsuccessful in obtaining admission to any part of the theatre. Mdme Nilsson as Leonora achieved another triumph. It was a noble performance, elaborated with consummate art. By the force of her genius, Mdme Nilsson—without effort, without striving after original effects or new readings—in the most natural manner, invests her impersonations with a charm all her own, and an originality which removes them into a sphere altogether above comparison with the same parts as represented by other great artists. They are, in fact, finished creations, which stand alone in all their beauty and perfection, and have a distinct individuality. This is equally true both of her acting and singing. Mdme Nilsson is entirely original in phrasing and vocalisation; her style of singing is as perfect as her noble and extraordinary voice, and as completely the reflection of her mind, taste, and great exceptional gifts. Mdme Nilsson's Margherita, Lucia, and Leonora, are all alike perfect in conception and execution—all equally original and great.

Dr Fox.—He likes them not.
Dr Goose.—Cur? (Why?)*
Dr Fox.—The one projected in "Lutetia" (Paris)* will hold from nine to ten thousand—sitters and non-sitters.
Dr Goose.—Well, why does Gounod object to that?
Dr Fox.—Sitters may be content, non-sitters anything but.
Dr Goose.—Granted. What has that to do with Gounod?
Dr Fox.—He likes not big theatres.
Dr Goose.—You have already said it. Cur? (Why!)*
Dr Fox.—He is a man of satin.
Dr Goose.—Velvet, you mean?
Dr Fox.—Satin.
Dr Goose.—Wax?
Dr Fox.—Satin!
Dr Goose.—Quid tum? (What next?)*
Dr Fox.—You have asked that already.
Dr Goose.—Be more explicit.
Dr Fox.—Well, in plain language, Gounod does not consider it right that more than from 800 to 1,000 sitters should hear any of his works at a time. The privilege is of such sort that it must not be lightly accorded to the globe entire.
Dr Goose.—The "terrestrial ball"—as Sir Richard Blackmore styles it, in his poem, The Creation?
Dr Fox.—Exactly so. You have swallowed The Creation?
Dr Goose.—Heugh! Be chesm! (On my eyes be it!)* But Richard Wagner?
Dr Fox.—Oh! that is different. Wagner, an exceptional being, has invited the Universe, including archangels, Mr Salaman, Dr Stone, and sea-serpents, to Bayreuth next year, for the Tetralogical-Trilogy.
Dr Goose.—At £45 a-head?
Dr Fox.—Exactly so. Only Dr Dannreuther will bring the "gigantic squirrel-shaped worm," together with other monsters of mythic notoriety;—and these are admitted on conscience.
Dr Goose.—Open, Sesame?
Dr Fox.—No.—O by Abs! O by Adnan! Wagner can abide no criticism but his own.
Dr Goose.—Then came Shiboob, like a male ostrich?
Dr Fox.—Precisely. Nevertheless, Charles Gounod likes not big theatres—wherein from Jacob Meyer Beer he differs. By the way, you sup with me on Christmas eve?
Dr Goose.—I can't. I have asked Dr Turkey to sup with me.
Dr Fox.—Come both; I shall be only too happy.
Dr Goose.—Not by no means! (Exeunt both edified.)

MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD'S FIRST RECITAL.

(From the New York "Touchstone.")

Mdme Goddard's recent pianoforte recital at Steinway's, revealed the superb genius of that great artist in a manner so impressive as to command the unanimous and instant recognition of a highly critical audience. Although of unusual difficulty, her programme was of the rarest excellence, affording ample scope for a full display of her wondrous powers. Beethoven, Schubert, Friedeman Bach, Thalberg, and Chopin, were interpreted by her in a manner so transcendent, so full of grandeur, beauty and sentiment, as to set all language at defiance, and give a quietus to that cheap generalization which charges her, amongst other things, with "coldness," as well as "want of breadth and individuality,"—terms understood among the initiated to be the safety valves of incompetent criticism.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

On the 17th November, 1842, Donizetti's Linda di Chamounix was first produced at Vienna.

Bartolomeo Cristofori is not the only person who can lay claim, it would appear, to the invention of the piano. France advances the rights of a certain Marius—not him of Carthage—who, in 1716, presented to the Academy of Sciences models of Clavecins à Maillets, or Mallet-Harpsichords, in which the strings, instead of being pinched, were struck by a mechanism of hammers. Germany, on the other hand, advances the pretensions of a Saxon organist named Schroeter, who, in 1717, conceived the plan of a new harpsichord, likewise with strings struck by a hammer. If Italian musicologists are not, however, blinded by patriotism, the priority is due to Bartolomeo Cristofori, who invented, as far back as 1711, a cimbalo a marteletti. In order to offend no one, we may say, that as Cristofori's instrument did not at once come into use, Marius and Schroeter may very well have known nothing about it, and have each invented the piano himself.

It has been said that Rossini was as fond of cookery as of music. He pretended, at least, to place them on an equality. A writer in the Siècle cites an unpublished letter in which the illustrious composer owns very wittily his weakness:

"Next to doing nothing, I know of no more delightful occupation than that of eating, by which I, of course, mean eating properly. What love is for the heart, eating is for the stomach. The stomach is the conductor who governs and inspires the great orchestra of our passions; an empty stomach represents to my mind the bassoon or the small flute, grunting out discontent, or squeaking forth envy; a full stomach, on the contrary, is the triangle of pleasure and the timbals of joy. As for love, I hold it to be pre-eminently the prima donna, the diva singing in our brain her cavatinas, which intoxicate the ear and entrance the heart. To eat and love, to sing and digest, such, in truth, are the four acts of the buffo opera called life, which vanishes like the foam from a bottle of champagne. Everyone who allows it to evaporate without enjoying it is an utter idiot.—Rossini."

"The piano" says a Frankfort paper, "is not sufficiently appreciated. There are clever men whom its very name will put to flight. They see in the piano only wearisome concerts, an interminable series of pianists hammering through sonatas by sheer strength; and pieces profusely adorned with arpeggios to the intense delight of young ladies at boarding-schools—all things, it is true, which may well sour the human heart. But what benefits does not the instrument offer us in return for these slight drawbacks! Was it not the piano which rid us of solo-players; of flautists who twisted up their mouths to blow into a small hole; of the piston, which resembled Æolus, and the noisy utterances of which made the window-panes tremble and stunned the audience; of the violinist with his irritating first string; of the lanquishing harpist; and of the clarinet, too accessible to prolonged squeaks. At present, the piano is the instrument in most general use. It enables one to read operatic scores and reproduces all their orchestral delicacies. It renders immense services to the study of singing and harmony, as well as musical composition. All honour, therefore, to Cristofori!"

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mrs John Macfarren, assisted by Miss Agnes Drummond and Mr Frank Holmes, gave a musical performance last Tuesday in connection with a grand fancy bazaar, which was carried out for a charitable object, under the auspices of Miss Northcroft, of St Mary's Hall, Canonbury. Miss Agnes Drummond sang "La Fioraia," Arthur Sullivan's "Evening Chimes," and Macfarren's "The beating of my own heart." Mr Frank Holmes sang "The Yeoman's Wedding," "The Stirrup Cup," and a charming new song, "Memories," composed expressly for him by his father, the eminent professor of the pianoforte, Mr W. H. Holmes. Mrs John Macfarren played a great variety of brilliant pianoforte pieces by Bach, Scarlatti, Weber, Schumann, Bülow, Brissac, and others, several of which she repeated, and the whole went off to the delight of a numerous company.

Islington.—A musical entertainment, one of a series, entitled "Monday Popular Entertainments," was given on Monday evening, at the Wellington Hall, Islington, under the direction of Messrs Alfred Bruce and Mr W. French, who presided as conductor at the pianoforte. On this occasion one of the leading vocalists was Signorina Clelia Alguro, who possesses a very fine contralto voice, has, we understand, studied in Italy, and sung at several of the theatres. She made a most favourable impression in the Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia, and in Crouch's ballad of "Kathleen Mavourneen;" in both of which she was much applauded, as was also Mr Edmund Stone in Balfe's popular romance "Si tu savais." Mrs Henry Vincent, Miss Grace Blatchley, and Mr F. Crowest, gave songs by Sir Julius Benedict, Mr F. Clay, &c., with more or less success, while Mr W. French received great applause for a solo on the pianoforte. The entertainment was successful.

The Aldermanbury Musical Society held their first soirée on Monday last, at the Oriental Buildings, Blackfriars. The large room of that edifice, well adapted for music, was filled with an elegant and appreciative audience. The music for the soirée, conducted by Mr Edward Graig, was of a popular kind, including glees, madrigals, quartets, sung by the members of the society, and rewarded with true English appreciation. There were some good solo singers—Miss Heath and Miss Ainsworth, a young pupil of Signor Visetti. Mr Lionel Levy made a very favourable impression in Gounod's "Le Soir" and Reber's "Hai Luli." Mr Levy possesses a voice of good quality, and sings with taste. Herr Jacques Rosenthal played Vieuxtemp's "Reverie" with great ability. Herr Lehmeyer added to the pleasures of the evening by his fine performance of Chopin's Nocturne and his own Valse. The concert was altogether a success, owing to the zealous labours of the conductor, Mr Edward Graig.—A. B.

Signor Rendano's concert, given at St James's Hall on Tuesday evening, with the assistance of the "Prize Winners" of the National Music Meetings (Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr Wharton, Mr Sylvester, and the Stepney Tonic Sol-fa Society), was highly successful, a numerous audience filling the hall, and eagerly "recalling" and rewarding the performers with hearty applause at the conclusion of each piece. Signor Rendano, who is a young Italian pianist of superior ability, did not spare himself, but played no less than nine pieces, four of which were composed by himself, and were remarkable for elegance, and their suitability for drawing-room performance. His other pieces were Mendelssohn's Prelude in E minor, Handel's variations on "The Harmonious Blacksmith," a scherzo from a serenade by Jadassohn, a minuet by Mr Hamilton Clark, and Sterndale Bennett's scherzo in E minor. After each of his performances Signor Rendano was warmly applauded and deservedly recalled. The "Prize Winners" were on their "best behaviour," and, in consequence, they were highly successful in winning applause. Miss Larkcom was especially rewarded after "Casta Diva," Miss Butterworth after Henry Smart's "By the blue sea," Mr Wharton after the same composer's "Tom Hardy," and Mr Sylvester and Mr Wharton after Walter Maynard's new duet, "The red and the blue." A very charming setting by Mr Charles Salaman of old William Whitehead's quaint description of "Celia," must not be passed over without a word of praise. The Stepney Society gave part-songs by Hatton, G. A. Macfarren, Festa, Spofforth, and Bishop. Between the parts Mr Augustus Tamplin played some pieces on Mason and Hamlin's "new orchestral organ" in masterly style, and well deserved the unanimous applause and recall awarded to him at the conclusion of his performance. Mr Hamilton Clark accompanied the vocal pieces on the pianoforte, and Mr W. G. McNaught conducted the part-songs.

The conductors of one of the Parisian Cafés Concerts are offering prizes for new compositions, which they undertake to produce.

Englishmen are not at present sufficiently continentalised to pocket, on leaving a Café, the sugar for which they have paid but which they have not consumed with their demi-tasse. They have, however, become wise enough, when a couple of them dine together, not to esteem it snobbish to divide one portion into two, and thus increase the variety of the dishes without augmenting the price. Let the same sensible plan be introduced into matters theatrical. Both managers and the public would profit thereby. R. K.

Episodes on Change.

Dr Shipping.—Why—I don't believe a word of it.
Dr Quince.—Well—what don't you believe?
Dr Shipping.—Why—that Tietjens was interviewed.
Dr Quince.—Well—Bülow was interviewed.
Dr Shipping.—Tietjens did not say that "Arabella" was a "mere automaton."
Dr Quince.—Nor that "Sterndale" was a "Mendelssohn in miniature"; but —— Dr Shipping (hastily).—But what?
Dr Quince.—Zaré Thalberg?
Dr Shipping.—And Christine Nilsson?
Dr Quince.—Well—I don't believe a word of that either.
Dr Shipping.—Why—of course not!
Dr Quince.—Let us be consoled.
Dr Shipping.—How consoled?
Dr Quince.—I don't know.
Dr Shipping.—Nor I.
Dr Quince.—Well—I suppose 'tis all right, or wrong?
Dr Shipping.—Why—or vice versâ.
Dr Quince.—Poor Bülow!
Dr Shipping.—Poor Tietjens!
Dr Quince.—Poor Sterndale!
Dr Shipping.—Poor Arabella!
Dr Quince.—We shall see!
Dr Shipping.—Why—what shall we see?
Dr Quince.—Well—what we SHALL see.
(Exeunt severally—"about Turkish.")

Madame Essipoff's Recitals.—We reserve until next week our remarks upon these brilliant and interesting performances, which are now the talk in all high class musical circles.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—On Friday next, this society will perform Handel's oratorio, Deborah. A work containing the Double Chorus, "Immortal Lord," and "See the proud chief," and airs, "In the battle fame pursuing," and "Tears such as tender fathers shed. Mdlle Levier, Miss Elton, Mr M. Smith, and Mr L. Thomas are the vocalists. On the following Friday (17th inst.), the forty-fourth annual Christmas Messiah performance will take place, when Mdme Nouver, Miss Enriquez, Mr Sims Reeves, Mr Fabrini, and Herr Behrens will sing, and Sir Michael Costa will conduct. The performance will be given at Exeter Hall.

Meiningen.—Herr Leopold Grützmacher has accepted the post of first violoncellist in the Grand-Ducal orchestra at Weimar, for which town he will leave at the commencement of next year.

Eisenach.—According to the report just issued by the Committee, the amount already received, and temporarily placed out at interest, for the erection of a bronze statue here to Johann Sebastian Bach, has reached 33,600 marks. As at least 48,000 marks are requisite, the Committee earnestly beg all admirers of the great master to aid the work as much as they can, by getting up concerts, and adopting other suitable means, so that the monument may be inaugurated, at the latest, in 1885, on the 200th anniversary of Bach's birth.

Confabulations Confidential.

Dr Fox (gaily).—So von Bülow has been interviewed?
Dr Goose.—Yes, poor fellow!
Dr Fox.—By whom?
Dr Goose.—By the interviewer of the New York Sun.
Dr Fox (meditatively).—That interviewer has a memory?
Dr Goose.—It serves him at pinches—column and half or so at pinch.
Dr Fox.—He writes shorthand?
Dr Goose.—No;—long.
Dr Fox.—How could he remember all von Bülow said?
Dr Goose.—He didn't; Ullman and Palmer did.
Dr Fox.—I am at wit's end.
Dr Goose.—Chickering 'gainst Steinway.
Dr Fox.—Old Hall 'gainst Young Hall?
Dr Goose.—Ullman 'gainst Strakosch.
Dr Fox.—Old Brush 'gainst Young Brush?
Dr Goose.—Aged brushes both.
Dr Fox.—Bülow finds all wrong in England?
Dr Goose.—He didn't find all right.
Dr Fox.—He smokes cigarettes.
Dr Goose.—So does Sainton.
Dr Fox.—But why is Sterndale a miniature Felix?
Dr Goose.—Why Arabella a mere automaton?
Dr Fox.—What has atmosphere to do with music?
Dr Goose.—London is fairer than Berlin!
Dr Fox.—England than Prussia!
Dr Goose.—Rhine excepted.
Dr Fox.—As Jolly had it, in an opera, at the Surrey,—

"I care not for its waters,
But I dearly love its wine."

Dr Goose (earnestly).—I can't imagine Bülow saying anything of the kind.
Dr Fox.—Too much of a gentleman to speak in disparaging terms of a lady he had never heard or seen.
Dr Goose.—Too much of an artist to say, what the interviewer reports him to have said, about an English composer whose music he frequently played in public.
Dr Fox.—Of his own free will—not at Bennett's solicitation?
Dr Goose.—The idea of Sterndale soliciting any body!
Dr Fox (tenderly).—May I repeat that I can't imagine it?
Dr Goose (with equal tenderness).—You may. I am with you.
Dr Fox.—Sup with me to-night?
Dr Goose.—Not by no means!
(Exeunt cordially—but severally.)

Trieste.—I Lituani has been produced very successfully at the Teatro Comunale. Sig. Faccio conducted. The composer, Sig. Ponchielli, was called on twenty-seven times the first night, and thirty-two the second.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In describing a recent performance, under Mr Charles Hallé, of Mendelssohn's St Paul (in the Free Trade Hall), the Manchester Guardian of 26th November speaks as follows about Mr Sims Reeves's singing:—

"Last night, for the first time for some years, we had the pleasure of hearing the tenor music—with the exception of the narative recitatives—sung by Mr Sims Reeves. Amongst the whole range of declamatory sacred music nothing finer than the oration of Stephen can be found, nor could be sung in a finer manner than by Mr Reeves. With him it is really a speech—he does not read it from his book like some, as if fearful of his next note; now he reasons, now persuades, and when, warming to his subject, he reminds them how—hard of heart like their fathers who persecuted the prophets—they themselves have slain the Just One, he rises to accents of scornful indignation which are interrupted—most naturally as we feel—by the muttered 'Stone him to death,' which, at first suggested by a single voice as it were, soon becomes the unanimous cry of the excited mob. While Mr Reeves can sing he will, in the intellectual character of his performances, be apparently without a rival; and the pleasure he thus produces is fortunately in a large measure independent of mere beauty of voice."

We hear that Mr Henry Gadsby has no less than three cantatas in MSS. ready for production, viz.: The Golden Legend, Alice Brand (words by Sir Walter Scott), and a setting of the 130th Psalm. We think this fact well worthy the attention of Mr Townshend, the honourable and experienced director of the Hereford Festival, who would do wisely (as he will, no doubt), to produce some novelty at what, for evident reasons, we cannot but by anticipation call the "Glorious meeting of 1876."

The Governing body of Eton College have acceded to a proposition that the acquirement of the rudiments of music shall be made compulsory upon all boys in the lower division—more than one fourth of the school. As nearly every boy passes through that division, this is equivalent to making it obligatory on the whole school. The school numbers a thousand boys, the majority of whom may, in the course of a few years, be filling the highest positions; it will, therefore, be evident how great an advantage is gained by making them practically acquainted with the principles of an art hitherto neglected by our rulers and governing bodies.

A series of the "National Music Meetings," for competition in high class music of every branch, will henceforth, we are informed, be held annually at one or other of the great central towns of England. Winners of prizes are expected, when occasion happens, to compete in London—which, as Mr Willert Beale, inventor and now sole conductor of the scheme, appropriately says, must thus become the final text of excellence. If managed with spirit and discretion, there is no reason why these National Music Meetings should not be productive of much good. The difficulty will be to get the judges so far from London as, for instance, Manchester, where the meetings are to held next year.

After announcing that three Italian composers, namely: the Cavaliere Lauro Rossi, Sig. Moralea, and Sig. Bonamici, are engaged in setting operas entitled Cleopatra, some Italian papers inform their readers that there have already been three operas with the same name, one written by Cimarosa in 1775; one by Anfossi, in 1776; and one by Guglielmi, in 1798. On this the Trovatore remarks that the number of Cleopatra operas already performed is not three only but thirteen. P. Daniele Castrovillari produced a Cleopatra at Venice in 1662; in 1704, Herr Mattheson wrote one, with a German text, for the Theatre, Hamburgh; Herr G. H. Graun composed another, also with German text, in 1742, at Berlin; a Cleopatra, by Danzi, was performed at Mannheim, in 1779; a Cleopatra by Weigl was brought out in 1807, at the Scala, Milan; and one by Paer at Paris in 1809. In 1813, yet another Cleopatra, from the pen of Sig. Nasolini, was produced by the Italian company in the same capital; there was one by Sig. De Combi, at Genoa, in 1842; one by Herr Truhn, at Berlin, in 1853; and one by the Baroness De Maistre.

The receipts at the Grand Opera, Paris, from the commencement of January to the end of October, this year, amounted to 2,772,891 francs for 148 performances, making an average of 18,000 francs each performance. As the total expenses were only 11,000 francs a-night, M. Halanzier's gains in ten months have been half-a-million of francs. Fortunate M. Halanzier.

In a recent number of the Perseveranza, Sig. Filippo Filippi, the eminent musical critic, relates the following anecdote:

"When, last year. M. Halanzier came to Milan, for the purpose of engaging Mdlle de Retzké, who has since proved so valuable an acquisition for the Opera, I had the honour of accompanying him to the Scala, and of describing to him the singular administrative system pursued there. The poor man could understand nothing of such a strange and complicated organization, in which everyone, including the Mayor, the Municipality, and the Committee, have a voice. He assured me that he himself would not submit to such an arrangement for four and twenty hours. 'I must be everything or nothing!' he exclaimed. Such an assertion," observes Sig. Filippi, "is very strong from the manager of a subsidised theatre, but no one can deny that, if things are to be done well and quickly, an impresario ought to enjoy as much freedom as possible."

We now know why King Ludwig, of Bavaria, paid, last August, his mysterious visit to the ancient city of Rheims. A few days since, he had Schiller's Jungfrau von Orleans performed, without the slightest curtailment, for himself only, at the Court Theatre, Munich. The performance lasted from 6 p m. to midnight. The object of his Majesty's trip to Rheims in the summer was simply to inspect the celebrated Cathedral where the Kings of France used to be crowned. Shorty after his Majesty's return, Herr Qualiglio, scenic artist at the Court Theatre, Munich, received instructions to proceed to Rheims, and make the sketches necessary to paint a grand and thoroughly exact representation of the Cathedral for the fourth act of Schiller's drama. The scene painted in obedience to these instructions was first used at the private performance mentioned above. According to his custom on such occasions the King made valuable presents to the artists engaged in the performance.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Town Hall, Poplar.—A musical entertainment was given on the 24th ult., in aid of the funds of a local institution. A long and varied programme was well rendered by the members of the Trinity Mutual Improvement Society, assisted by Misses Hughes, Evans, and Harding, and Messrs Charles and Ernest Durham. Miss Hughes, a young lady with a pleasing "high mezzo-soprano" voice and good method, sang "Little Maid of Arcadee," and "It was a dream." Mr Charles Durham had a good opportunity for the display of his fine voice in "Qui sdegno," an opportunity which he did not lose sight of. Mr Ernest Durham played with his accustomed neatness and precision Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo," besides accompanying some of the vocal numbers in a thoroughly artistic manner. S.

Mrs John Macfarren gave a pianoforte and vocal recital, in connection with the South Western Railway, at Brunswick House, Vauxhall, on Tuesday last. The accomplished pianist, who has been heard here on several occasions, was cordially greeted on her appearance, and enthusiastically applauded throughout the evening. She played a widely contrasted selection of pieces, to each of which she imparted a special charm by the brilliancy and artistic finish of her execution. The vocal portion of the programme was effectively given by two very promising students of the Royal Academy of Music, Miss Marion Williams and Miss Reimar, who sang Mendelssohn's two part-song, "I would that my love," and Professor Macfarren's duet, "O sweet summer morn," the latter being vociferously encored. Miss Marion Williams had to repeat Mr Arthur Sullivan's "Let me dream again," and Miss Reimar, Vincent Wallace's "Sweet and low."

Kew.—A Bazaar in connection with the Flower Mission, which, it may be remarked, is a thing of itself, and in no way connected with any special religious movement or party, was held here on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, under the distinguished patronage of H.R.H. the Duchess of Cambridge and H.R.H. Princess Mary Adelaide, Duchess of Teck, &c., &c. The principal promoters of the Bazaar were the Hon. Mrs Hodgson, of Kew Palace, and Mrs Walker, of Cumberland Gate. The stalls were attended to by Mrs Hodgson and Mrs Walker respectively. The Hon. Mrs

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The first of Mr Hallé's Choral Concerts of the present season, on Thursday last, was made memorable by the revival of Handel's Saul, and it is pleasant to be able to say that the oratorio was heard with unquestionable interest—with an attention, too, that increased during the performance. To mention all the impressive numbers of this oratorio would be to review the work, but I may say that Saul, as given by Mr Hallé, was in no sense either dreary or monotonous. The unusual interest of the oratorio is continuous; and, though the raising of Samuel, and the beautiful lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan, are perhaps the finest portions of the oratorio, the choruses and airs in the earlier parts include some of Handel's grandest inspirations. The performance was admirable; and, if Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, by her singing of the air for the "Witch of Endor" gave us one of the most splendid examples of sacred dramatic singing ever heard, it may be said that the singing of all her colleagues was worthy of the occasion. The other singers were Miss Katherine Poyntz, Madame Patey, and Messrs Lloyd, Foli, and Lovatt. The band and chorus were both efficient, and the success of the oratorio with the audience was frequently testified by loud applause.

Here is the programme for this week's concert:—

Overture, Die Zauberflöte (Mozart); Cavatina, "Una voce poco fa," Il Barbiere (Rossini)—Mdlle Zaré Thalberg; Caprice, Allegro giojoso, pianoforte, in E, Op. 22 (W. S. Bennett)—Mr. Charles Hallé; Air, "Batti, batti," Don Giovanni (Mozart)—Mdlle Zaré Thalberg; "Suite," No. VI. in C, Op. 150, first time (Franz Lachner); Overture, A Midsummer Night's Dream (Mendelssohn); Solo Pianoforte, (a) Nocturne, in F minor, (b) Grande Polonaise, in A flat (Chopin)—Mr. Charles Hallé; Entr'acte, from Manfred, Reinecke; Aria and Valz, Fra Diavolo (Auber)—Mdlle Zaré Thalberg; Overture, The Merry Wives of Windsor (O. Nicolai).

Mr Carl Rosa commenced his third campaign of English opera at the Theatre Royal on Monday last. The Marriage of Figaro was given, with the same cast as in London, and last night (Tuesday) a splendid performance of Fra Diavolo followed. Mr Santley, as the brigand chief, achieved a great success.

New York.—The English Opera season at Booth's Theatre began with Mignon. Miss Kellogg was the heroine; Miss Beaumont, Frederick; Miss Julia Rosenwald, Fillina; Mr Castle, Wilhelm Meister; and Mr Peakes, Lothario. Verdi's Ernani followed, with Mdme Van Zandt as Elvira, Mr Geo. A. Conly as the Duke, Mr Carlton, Don Carlos, and Mr Castle, Ernani; and then came Balfe's Bohemian Girl. Miss Kellogg, as Arline, never sang better in her life, and Mrs Seguin, as the Gipsy Queen, fairly shared the honours with her. Mr Maas has improved immensely, and his performance of Thaddeus was one that had not been equalled in this city for some years. "When other lips," and "The fair land of Poland," very narrowly escaped triple encores. Faust was the next opera, Miss Kellogg representing Marguerite. Miss Kellogg's performance was a splendid one. Mr Maas again charmed the audience by the freshness of his voice. He is graceful and earnest in everything, and controls his voice with admirable discretion. Mr Peakes was Mephisto, Mr Carleton, Valentine, and Mrs Seguin, Siebel. This was followed by Meyerbeer's Huguenots, Mdme Jenny Van Zandt assuming the part of Valentine and achieving a success far beyond anything anticipated. Miss Anne Montague, of Baltimore, made her new York début as Margherita. Mrs Seguin was Urbano, Mr Conly, Marcel, and Messrs Castle, Carleton, and Peakes, Raoul, Nevers, and St Bris. The Bohemian Girl was repeated at a matinée, and in the evening Fra Diavolo was given, with Mdme Van Zandt as Zerlina. The operas announced are Il Trovatore, The Bohemian Girl, Martha, and, first time in America, Sir Julius Benedict's Lily of Killarney, Miss Kellogg being the Eily O'Connor, and Mr Henry Allen (his first appearance), Myles-na-Coppaleen.—The New York Herald says of Miss Kellogg's Marguerite:—Acting with more than usual care, and avoiding a propensity to indulge in by-play, the lady presented a charming ideal of Goethe's heroine. In the garden scene and at the death of Valentin, the beauty and compass of Miss Kellogg's voice were shown in all their brilliancy; Mr Maas as Faust was clear and conscientious, and he sang well. Indeed, this artist improves upon acquaintance, for he possesses the faculty of reserving his force, and thus maintains his part with honour. Mr Carlton was Valentine, and Mr Peakes, Mephisto.—(From a Correspondent, with leanings.)

GOUNOD AND BIG THEATRES.

(From the "Graphic.")

M. Gounod, who, we are pleased to learn, is gradually recovering from the effects of an accident that might have put his life in imminent peril, already shows himself able to enter with warm interest upon discussions affecting the art of which he is one of the chief existing ornaments. He firmly repudiates the idea of a vast opera house, capable of accommodating from 9,000 to 10,000 spectators at cheap prices. Among other passages contained in his vigorous disclaimer, it will be enough to cite the following:—

"Pas de Colossal.—C'est la MORT de l' art musical, surtout au théâtre, où la trop grande distance entre le chanteur et l' auditeur supprime toute physionomie et toute intérêt, et reduit le chanteur à se surmener dans le vide."

We entirely agree with M. Gounod, with the addition that his objection applies just as powerfully to concert rooms as to theatres, and this notwithstanding the fact of M. Davioud and M. Bourdais (both men of science), the former from an optical, the latter form an acoustical point of view, protesting that the scheme of a "vaste salle d'Opera populaire" is quite feasible. The idea originated with M. Adolphe Sax, inventor and manufacturer of the family of wind instruments appropriately styled "Saxophones."

EDMOND ABOUT.

Edmond François Valentin About was born in 1828, at Dience, and is therefore 47 years old at the present date. He early evinced fondness for metaphysical speculations, and at 20 bore off the honours and prizes in philosophy at the "Charlemagne." At this age he entered the Normal College, which he soon abandoned for the French school at Athens. In this city he worked assiduously, employing even his leisure in studying the archæology and the contemporary history of Greece. His first volume, La Grèece Contemporaine, was a trenchant satire upon Greek life, and created a considerable sensation. Athens was especially enraged at the slurs alike upon the ancient courage and the modern honour of the Hellenes. The volume was applauded by the Revue des deux Mondes, which published the succeeding work of the young author,—a novel, entitled, Tolla: A Tale of Modern Rome.

This book excited criticism afresh, and it was asserted that the entire narrative had been borrowed from an Italian work published in Paris in 1841. About acknowledged, in the concluding paragraphs of his book, his indebtedness to the Italian story—which was a true one, by the way—for the materials of his romance; but, as the original publication had been suppressed on its issue, it was impossible to say how much he had borrowed and how much invented. Tolla was, at all events, a fascinating work, and for a time monopolized the conversation in the Parisian salons.

The next literary attempt of About was in the direction of the drama, but proved an absolute failure. In 1855 he published a work on art-criticism, styled à Voyages Travers l'Exposition des Beaux Arts, and in 1856 a popular collection of stories under the name of Les Marriages de Paris. He now became one of the staff of Figaro, and afterwards found a place on the Moniteur, contributing romances and causeries, the latter often made up of art criticisms, afterwards reprinted in a volume. In 1857 About was one of the editors of the Learned Ass, a singular and short-lived sheet containing every variety of eccentric literature. In 1862 About published a second drama, which was withdrawn after four representations in Paris of the most "tumultuous character." The piece was played for several weeks in provincial towns, exciting the liveliest manifestations. At this time About was connected with the Constitutionnel as well as the Moniteur.

After extensive travels in Italy in 1858 and 1859, About produced La Question Romaine, a political effusion advocating the abolition of the temporal power of the Pope. In 1858 he received the decoration of the Legion of Honour from the Emperor, in whose service he had for some time been. During the Franco-Prussian war About acted as special correspondent, but his exciting letters were suddenly cut short, or rather modified, by his incarceration in a German prison. About married in 1864.

Madame Arabella Goddard gave a matinée at Steinway Hall, on Thursday afternoon, the 21st ult., before a select and critical audience, who listened to a very classical programme with profound attention. Mdme Goddard's selections were: Fantasie, Op. 78, Franz Schubert; Thirty-two variations on an original air, Op. 36, Beethoven; Fantasie, W. Friedeman Bach; Waltz, Op. 34, No. 2, Chopin, and "Study in E flat," Thalberg. The fair artist laid out for herself a good deal of hard work, but she proved herself full able to sustain the pressure with honour and success. In all she did Mdme Goddard exhibited careful and intelligent study, and a fine appreciation of her authors, together with a rare refinement of expression. Her touch is exceedingly beautiful, being at once delicate, sensitive, firm and nervous. Her performance throughout was received with tokens of warm admiration, and the desire to hear her again was proven by frequent recalls and implied encores, to which she rarely responded. Mdme Goddard was assisted by Mr Tom Karl and M. Sauret.—Watson's Art Journal.

Howard Glover.—The death of this well-known English musician, at New York—on the 28th ult., in his 57th year—is announced in the local papers. Howard Glover was second son of the once celebrated actress, Mrs Glover. In his earliest youth he showed a predilection for music, and was sent both to Italy and Germany to pursue his studies. He attained marked proficiency as violinist, composer, and singer, adding to this a mastery of languages, and a general culture, that not too many of his fellow artists could boast. In England Mr Glover was chiefly occupied as a teacher, imparting to others the practical experience he himself had gained after years of diligent application. He, at the same time, won no small distinction as a composer. The works by which he is principally known are an opera in three acts, founded upon Victor Hugo's Ruy Blas, of which he wrote both libretto and music; and a characteristic cantata, called Tam O'Shanter (first produced at the Birmingham Festival), for which the immortal poem of Robert Burns supplied the theme. He was, however, also author of many beautiful songs, set to verses by Shelley and other poets. Seven years ago Mr Glover left England for America, whence he never returned. He has left a large family. —Graphic.

Rejected lover—"But couldn't you learn to love me?" Young lady—"I might, if I never saw you again."

Mr Val Prinsep, the artist, has written two or three dramas, one of which will be produced at the Court Theatre.

The Shreveport Times refers to a contemporary as "a sickly jackass who edits a paper half the size of his ears."

M. Gounod has almost entirely recovered from his late accident. The last bandages have been taken off his shoulder.

The subscriptions to the proposed memorial of Lord Byron, in London, amount to £2,000. Further help is required.

The publication of the first volume of a large work on Haydn is announced at Berlin. This author is Herr C. F. Pohl.

At a concert at Florence recently a "grand fantasia" for 12 pianos was executed by twice as many young ladies playing at on ce.

The charming Miss Ada (she should have been Aïda) Cavendish has been giving a series of performances at the Brighton Theatre.

After nearly three years' absence from New York, Mr Edwin Booth has made his reappearance at Fifth Avenue Theatre as Hamlet.

The Abbate Franz Liszt will pass the winter at Rome. He has scored his "Hungarian Rhapsody" for the Pinelli Orchestral Society.

Mr Arthur Sullivan's comic cantata, Trial by Jury, was represented for the first time in America on the 22nd of October, at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia.

Déjazet is again seriously ill. She was forced to take to her bed after the performance on behalf of M. Grenier, and has since been growing gradually worse.

Mdlle Ida Corani, the young vocalist whose successes in Italy and Spain have been frequently mentioned, is to make her début in England, at the Crystal Palace, early next month.

The Messrs Gatti have re-engaged the principal members of their orchestra for the autumn and winter of 1876—a tolerably fair test of their success this year. Sig. Arditi is again to be the conductor.

The Dean and Chapter of Hereford have granted the use of the cathedral for the festival of the Three Choirs, to be held next year in that city. At the Annual Audit Dinner the Dean expressed himself strongly on the subject.

A complimentary benefit will be given to Mr Edmund Falconer, at Drury Lane Theatre, on Wednesday, November 24th. The performance will commence at two o'clock. The piece selected for the occasion is the Colleen Bawn.

Mr and Mrs Charles Mathews left town last week for Brindisi en route for Calcutta.

Madame Marie Jaëll, the pianist, has just composed a quartet for piano and stringed instruments.

The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, on the occasion of their late visit to the Haymarket Theatre, honoured Mr Buckstone by inspecting a picture painted by Mr Buckstone, jun., and expressed themselves in very complimentary terms upon its merit.

There is a chance that Herr Edward Reményi, the Hungarian violinist, may pay London another visit, after an interval of a good many years. We have many foreign violinists and many foreign pianists among us just now. One the more, however, can make little difference.

The new work of M. Victor Hugo, Pendant l'Exil, has been published by Michel Levy. It is the second part of Actes et Paroles, and is summed up by three lines on the title page:—"The Exiles.—The Graves.—The Scaffolds.—The Wars of Peoples.—The Fêtes of Kings.—Struggles for Liberty and Peace."

Miss Kate Gordon, the pianist, brought an action against the Metropolitan District Railway Company, claiming damages for an injury to one of her arms, consequent upon an alleged attempt of a guard to drag her out of a carriage she had entered. The jury returned a verdict in favour of the Railway company.

Miss Mary Fisher, a daughter of the popular comedian, Mr David Fisher, and herself a pianist of no ordinary ability, gave a matinée musicale at Langham Hall, Great Portland Street, on Saturday week. The concert was rendered more interesting by the fact that Mr Fisher, whose talent as a violinist is well known to the public, joined with his daughter in the performance of a grand sonata of Beethoven.

It is to be hoped that the marriage of Miss Edith Wynne, which was solemnized on Tuesday afternoon, in the Chapel Royal, Savoy, will not deprive our musical public of the artistic services of a lady, whose bardic title, "Eos Cymri" (Welsh Nightingale), so well befits her. We are not so rich in singers that we can afford to lose the eloquently sympathetic interpretess of Schubert's "Young Nun," and so many other beautiful things.—Graphic.

The Duke of Edinburgh lately visited the works for the construction of the New Grand National Opera House on the Victoria Embankment. He was received by Mr Mapleson and Mr Francis Fowler, the architect. His Royal Highness expressed his surprise at the great progress made on the building, and at the scope and excellence of the design. Six hundred workmen are now engaged on the edifice, and are assisted by ten steam engines.

The Executive Committee of the Ladies' Educational Association, in connection with University College London, have issued invitations to a musical lecture, to be given on Tuesday evening, November 23rd, in the Botanical Theatre of University College, Gower Street, by Professor Bernardin Rahn, in illustration of a new method of learning musical composition. Professor Rahn will be assisted by Herr Theodore Frantzen (pianist) and Herr George Werrenrath (vocalist).

Italian papers continue to speak very highly of the Young English basso, Mr Frank Foote (Francesco Franceschi). He has, during the month of October, been singing with great success at the Theatre at Monza, as Fra Cristofori in I Promessi Sposi, and Metello Pio Arciflamine, in La Vestale. He was much applauded, and called before the curtain after each piece. He is engaged to sing, this Carnival, at one of the principal theatres in Milan, and will make his appearance as the Count in La Sonnambula.—(Communicated.)

Roscoe Conkling's father was for many years a prominent man in public life, and to the last preserved a full sense of his importance. He was on one occasion present at a great public meeting where his son had entertained the delighted crowd in his usual eloquent style. An officious friend led the veteran to the front of the platform and introduced him with a great flourish as "the father of Roscoe Conkling." "Good Heavens?" said the disgusted old man. "United States Minister to Mexico, and over twenty years judge of the United States Court, and now known as the father of Roscoe Conkling!"

There's not much in a name after all,—especially in the name of a stock. The prettiest names on the California Stock Board, for instance, are not the most highly valued. The Silver Cloud and the Golden Chariot Companies have seemed to illustrate the homely maxim. Both of them are in financial difficulties, clamouring for assessments. At a recent meeting of the Golden Chariot stockholders a very indignant capitalist rose and said: "Permit me to say that I have owned Golden Chariot stock for two years; that I paid 19 dols. 50 cents a share, and have paid 9 dols. 50 cents assessments, and 'm d—d if I pay any more."

A disturbance occurred three evenings back at the Opera House of Lyons. The piece was Lucia di Lammermoor. At the moment the orchestra commences the overture, cries arose from all parts of the house of, "Away with the manager!" and a shower of missiles were hurled on the stage. The police had to interfere.

At the Arch Theatre, Philadelphia, Tennyson's Queen Mary has been performed. Great preparations had been made for its production, and public interest was aroused to its highest pitch. It was a most lamentable failure, the adapter having taken great liberties with the text. It was withdrawn at the end of a week.

M. Garnier, the architect of the Grand Opera, is about to leave Paris for Bordighiera, a small village between San Remo and Vintimille. The climate there is exceptionally mild and beautiful. Frost and snow are unknown. The object of his trip is to construct a palace with a theatre attached to it for a millionaire friend.

Miss Purdy has been singing at Brighton with success. "At a recent concert given in the Pavilion"—the Brighton Herald says—"Miss Purdy, who has a rich and well cultivated voice, sang Sullivan's ballad, 'Guinevere,' and Gounod's 'Maid of Athens,' with great expression."

"The arduous part of Zerlina in Don Giovanni"—says the Liverpool Post—"was more than sustained; it was made both touching and brilliant by Mdlle Bianchi, who bore off the palm as a singer, being delightfully sympathetic, as well as charming in execution." Signor Naudin is also highly praised by the same authority for his rendering of the part of Don Ottavio.

Le Pompon, the new work composed by M. Lecocq, and produced but recently at the Folies-Dramatiques, if we may rely upon the judgment of Parisian critics, approaches nearer and nearer the style of "opéra comique," leaving the "opérette" and "opéra-bouffe" further and further in the background. Thus progressing, M. Lecocq may one day fairly lay claim to the title, "Adolphe Adam the Second."

Wagner has arrived at Vienna, to superintend the getting up of his Tannhaüser, which is to be given without curtailments. If the Viennese find their patience tried with nearly five hours of music, they will enjoy an opportunity of appreciating the work at its intrinsic value. It is said that Wagner intends to pass the winter at Vienna with his family, Lohengrin and other operas of his being in preparation.

Alexandra Palace.—During the Cattle Show week, commencing on Monday next, Romah, the famous athlete, will give his performances at the Palace daily. On Tuesday, Miss Lydia Thompson will appear in Farnie's successful burlesque of Blue Beard. This will be the last theatrical entertainment previous to the 20th inst., when the Christmas Pantomime will be produced, and when Mr George Conquest will appear, embodying the extraordinary and novel feats for which he is so celebrated. On Saturday next Handel's Oratorio, Esther, will be repeated, under the conductorship of Mr H. Weist Hill, with an increased orchestra and chorus; and the members of the German Gymnastic Society will give one of their peculiar and admirably-conducted displays.

The welcome accorded to Mdlle Zaré Thalberg on her entrance as Zerlina showed that, either for the sake of her father's well-cherished memory, or in compliment to her already considerable reputation and charming, piquant looks, her appearance was regarded as the principal event of the night. As yet she has not succeeded in throwing much practical coquetry into the business of the part; but so pretty a young lady cannot but please, and her singing is of high merit and still higher promise. A voice often silvery and always bell-like in its pure and transparent clearness, is employed with a skill which speaks of careful training and great natural talent. Encored in "La ci darem" and "Batti, batti," Mdlle Thalberg shone chiefly, in our judgment, in "Vedrai carino." She was inundated with applause and bouquets.—Liverpool paper.

If we are to credit all we hear, the 15th of the present month, Monday next, will be marked with a white stone amongst us, inasmuch as an artist, said to be the greatest of living pianists, is to make his début before a New York audience at Chickering Hall. That he is a man of extraordinary powers there can be no doubt, but whether his genius is of an exalted character,—whether he plays from within or from without, remains to be decided by those who are competent to judge. Upon this point we can, of course, venture no opinion as yet. We may, however, observe, that all the education, practice, and study of which the human mind and organism are capable—that fingers swift as lightning, and with a touch as delicate as that of a falling rose-leaf,—that a grasp filled with harmonious thunders, and as true and as certain in its operations as the course of the stars, will not impart one spark of genius, or make a pianoforte player in the most exalted acceptation of that term. We may remark that Doctor Bülow is doubtless possessed of all the inner light necessary to give true life to his great art.—New York Touchstone.

The great organ erected by the well-known French manufacturer, Cavaillé-Coll, for the Palace of Industry, at Amsterdam, was "opened" a short time since by M. Guilmant, an organist fully equal to the occasion. The new instrument, under the hands of this esteemed professor, surpassed expectation, and is praised by the Dutch critics, which, when we remember they possess such organs as those at Haarlem and Rotterdam, is saying no little.—Graphic.

Organ Recital.—Dr A. L. Peace gave the first of his tenth annual series of organ recitals at the University, Glasgow, on Saturday, 27th November, 1875. The following is the programme:—Organ concerto, G major (introduction, allegro, adagio, allegro, finale), Handel; Air, with variations, for the organ, Adolphe Hesse; Bourée, and Fugue (on a subject by Corelli), B minor, J. S. Bach; Larghetto (Ninth Quartet), Mozart; Gratulations (menuet), Beethoven; Overture in F, Schubert.

La Reine Indigo of Johann Strauss, son of the prince of waltz composers, Ferdinand Strauss, and husband of Jetty Treffz, whose merry refrain, "Trab, trab, trab," at the late Jullien's Promenade Concerts, still lingers in the ear of many an amateur, has been revived at the Renaissance. Strauss is likely to become a formidable rival to Offenbach, Lecocq, &c. At the general rehearsal of La Reine Indigo, the Italian actor, Sig. Rossi, a fanatical admirer of the music of Strauss, was conspicuous among those present.

Mdlle Tietjens has been singing in Montreal after her success having been variously estimated in Boston. Mme Arabella Goddard declined, we learn, to accompany Mr Strakosch to Canada. She rejoins his company, however, at Albany. Like those of the distinguished German cantatrice, her performances also were made the subject of conflicting opinions at the "Hub"—the headlong Wagnerian critic of the Gazette denouncing them in toto, while the more discriminating and refined pen of the Transcript took the opposite extreme.—Correspondence of the "New York Touchstone."

As much interest is felt in the proceedings of the Royal Albert Hall at the present time, we have been requested to state the position of its affairs. At the last annual meeting the council was unanimously instructed to apply for an Act of Parliament to provide funds for the maintenance and working of the hall. This Bill has now been draughted, and provides that the council shall annually prepare an estimate for the maintenance of the structure, and lay this before a general meeting of seat-holders, who may, if they desire, rate themselves for a further sum to work the hall; but it is provided that both sums shall not exceed £2 per seat. The Bill also provides for the purchase of seats on equitable terms from seat-holders who object to the rating powers of the Bill.—Times

Musical Copyrights.—A sale of important Musical Copyrights—being the Stock of Messrs. Duff & Stewart, the well-known publishers, of 147, Oxford Street—has just been concluded by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson. The sale extended over five days, and brought together a large attendance of gentlemen connected with the music trade and profession. Subjoined we give a list of the high prices obtained for some of the more prominent lots. These Masses are published in a cheap form, in order to meet a growing demand for simple, melodious, harmonized music. In the cases where the register has been found too high for boys' voices, supplementary notes have been inserted.

They are thus adapted as well for Chancel Choirs, as for those in which the Soprano parts are taken by female voices.

OF

Four Songs

COMPOSED BY

WM STERNDALE BENNETT

(OP. 47).

*No. 1.MAIDEN MINE.
2. SUNSET.
*3.DANCING LIGHTLY.
4. STAY, MY CHARMER.

Price 4s. each.

Of this Set of Songs, the first three are not strictly posthumous works, as they were printed and quite ready for publication at the time of the composer's death. The fourth existed only in Manuscript.

* Sung by Mr SHAKESPEARE at the first Monday Popular Concert of the Season, St James's Hall, on Monday, Nov. 8, 1875.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Mr Shakespeare brought forward two unknown songs by the late Sterndale Bennett, set to some graceful stanzas from the pen of Mr T. Case. Both are the genuine products of an experienced pen, instinct with that melodious charm and refinement of detail for which even the least ambitious of their composer's works are distinguished. Musicians may give preference to the first—'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer"; but the majority of the uninitiated will, we think, find most sympathy with the second—'Maiden Mine'—as unpretending and perfect a ballad as can be imagined."—Times, 10th November, 1875.

"Two charming effusions by Sterndale Bennett, recently published under the titles, 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.' Both are destined to be favourites."—Daily Telegraph, 10th November, 1875.

"Mr Shakespeare introduced two new songs by Sir Sterndale Bennett, as delicious and elegant as anything that ever fell from his pen, the titles of which are 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.'"—Standard, 9th November, 1875.

GREGORIAN FESTIVAL.

(From the "Richmond and Twickenham Times," November 20.)

One of the most remarkable services that has ever taken place at the Richmond parish church was the Gregorian festival, on Thursday evening last week. The introduction, or rather the revival of Gregorian music in the Established Church of this country has been watched with great interest both by friends and foes, and this gave an unusual importance to the festival. Centuries ago the Catholic Church, including its English branch, had a kind of plain song or chant for every part of divine service when rendered chorally, and in England, as well as other parts of the Western Church, the system which prevailed was called the Gregorian Chant (Cantus Gregorianus), from St Gregory the Great, who was Patriarch of Rome at the end of the sixth century. It must not be implied from the name that all the music of this system was composed by St Gregory, for a considerable portion of it is known to have been contributed in later ages, while there can be but little doubt that the Gregorian chants for the Psalms were derived from those used by the Jews of old. The chants of the versicles and responses and the monotone of the collects have been retained in our cathedral and collegiate churches to the present day, and several of the Psalm chants were in daily use at least down to the time of the Great Rebellion. Various causes have been assigned for their falling out of use, most prominent among them being the preference for music in harmony, and the light, and some think, improved taste in music which prevailed after the Restoration. The plain song of the Holy Communion and a number of Gregorian hymn tunes had never, till of late years, being set to English words, though perfectly capable of such adaptation. The London Gregorian Choral Association, under whose auspices the festival at Richmond was given, have already succeeded in spreading a taste for this kind of music, and, whilst holding the principle that modern tunes are adaptable to modern hymns, they seek to promote the use of the ancient tunes, tones, or music of the Church, to her ancient songs and hymns. The festival of which we now have to speak was the last of a series of four which have been arranged to be held in various churches in London preparatory to the grand festival service which the association hopes to celebrate in the spring of next year. By the consent of the churchwardens, the whole of the seats in the church were thrown open, and before the service commenced they were fully occupied. The choirs who took part in the service were those of St Mary Magdalene, Richmond; St Mary the Virgin, Soho; St John the Evangelist, Hammersmith; St Matthias, Stoke Newington; St Stephen, Lewisham; Selhurst; St Mary Magdalene, Paddington; St Ambrose, Paddington; St Barnabas, Rotherhithe; St Peter, Bethnal Green; St Agatha, Finsbury; Christ Church, Endell Street; St Agatha, Beckenham; and St Gabriel, Newington. The procession entered the church in the following order:—

Processional Cross.
Boys of the Plain-song Choir.
Boys of the Harmony Choir.
Banner of the Cross.
Band.
Men of the Plain-song Choir.
Banner of the Cross.
Men of the Harmony Choir.
Banner of St John the Evangelist, Hammersmith.
Cantors.
Lay Reader.
The Clergy.
The Vicar.
Banner of St Mary Magdalene.
The Bishop.

Mr C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., presided at the organ, and, in addition to this, there was the band mentioned above, consisting of four brass instruments. The music for the festival was selected with great care, and the way in which it was rendered reflected credit not only on the choirs who sang, but also on Mr. Warwick Jordan, who is the honorary organist of the association, and who personally conducted the rehearsals for the service. The processional canticle was Benedicite Omnia Opera, set to the well-known 1st ending of the 5th tone; and, as the tone was one to which the congregation of the parish church are well accustomed, it was immediately taken up with spirit by those in the church. The versicles and responses were a harmonised adaptation from the Mecklin Recitatorium and Processionale Parvum. The plain-song or melody was sung by the choirs in the body of the church, and the accompanying harmonies by those in the chancel. The Proper Psalms were xxix., xlv., and cxxxiv., sung to the 5th, 8th, and 3rd tones respectively. The Psalms were sung in unison throughout, the boys and men taking alternate verses, but the Glorias were in four-part harmony, the plain-song being in the tenor in the last verses. The Magnificat was an elaborate setting of the Tonus Peregrinus with the festival intonation, harmonised by the great composer Bach in the Vierstimmige Choralgesange, and, after the Te Deum, was undoubtedly the most difficult piece of music in the service-book. The variation in the voices was particularly pleasing in this canticle, some verses being sung by the harmony choir only, others by all the choirs in unison, others again by the boys, and others by the men only. The band also assisted, with magnificent effect, and many sat down at the conclusion of the Magnificat with the conviction that for grandeur of effect Gregorian music is unsurpassed. The Nunc Dimittis was set to the 1st tone, 4th ending, harmonised by W. H. Monk, the musical editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern. This chant, subdued and almost plaintive in its character, was sung very sweetly by the choirs, the contrast from the swell of the organ, combined with the band and voices in the preceding canticle, being peculiarly impressive. The anthem was the only piece of modern music in the service-book, the composer being Dr Stainer. It was sung by all the choirs, accompanied by the band and organ with precision and effect. The hymn before the sermon, "Lucis Creator Optime," from the Salisbury Hymnal, was sung in unison by boys and men in alternate verses. The gem of the service-book, however, was generally considered to be the hymn after the sermon, "Jesu Dulcis Memoria." This hymn, called the Jubilus of St Bernard, and known to mediæval writers as the "Rosy Hymn," was sung to a most beautiful sequence from the Salisbury Gradual. The melody, although varied in every verse, preserved its identity to the end; and, while listening to the hymn, it was difficult to believe that the music should have been composed hundreds of years ago for the English Church, and yet should have passed into obscurity in these modern times. The Te Deum, sung after the Benediction had been given by the Bishop, was a very strict Gregorian composition. The arrangement was an adaptation from the York Processional of an old English form of the original melody. The alternate verses were sung by the harmony choir, the other verses being taken by both choirs in unison. We can understand that the Te Deum might be found too severe for any who may have heard it on this occasion for the first time. We were assured, however, that a more intimate knowledge of the music would soon overcome any possible objections from ordinary critics of church music. The service was concluded by two recessional hymns—viz., "There is a blessed home," sung to the melody Anue Christe from La Feillée, and the well-known Urbs Beata Hierusalem, the latter printed for use at this the last of the four great autumn Gregorian festivals.

CAMBRIDGE.

EXAMINATION FOR THE DEGREE OF BACHELOR OF MUSIC.
(DR G. A. MACFARREN—Professor.)

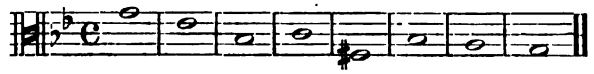
Tuesday, December 7, 1875.

1. Add three parts above the following bass according to the figuring; and state, on an extra staff beneath, the root of each chord, and its Diatonic or Chromatic position in the key of A minor—as Tonic, Minor 2nd., and Dominant, &c.

2. Add three parts below the following treble, limiting the choice of harmony to the Diatonic or Chromatic concords or discords in the key of F minor; figure the bass; and state, on an extra staff beneath, the root of each chord and its Diatonic or Chromatic position in the key of F minor.

3. Write a counterpoint of the first species above the following subject. Write another below the subject. In each case, figure the bass. There will be no figuring for the common bass. There will be no figuring for the common chord, except when needed to denote the inflection of one of its intervals, or else to displace some other harmony on the same bass note.

4. Write a counterpoint of the third species (with four notes against one) above the following subject. Write another below the subject. Figure the bass.



5. Write a counterpoint of the fifth species, for second soprano, above the following subject, and fill up the harmony with parts for first soprano, alto and tenor (each in its proper clef) in counterpoint of the first species, in which the crossing of parts must be avoided. Figure the bass.

6. Continue the following as a canon for 2 in 1 in the 8th below, and make the canon perpetual. Add a free coda of one or more bars. Figure the bass.

Either use the following conclusion, or not, at discretion.

7. Write the answers to the following fugal subjects; state whether they are real or tonal, whether authentic or plagal.

8. Write three enharmonic changes of this chord  State what is the root of each of the four, and resolve each on the chord of the key-note (direct or inverted) of which its root is the dominant.

9. Transpose the following into the key of D, making such modification of the parts for violins and viola as will bring the notes within the respective compass of these instruments.

[The example here proposed consists of the opening four bars of introduction to Mozart's famous symphony in E flat.—ED.]

10. State the pitch of this note  respectively on an 8-ft. stop, a 16-ft. stop, a 4-ft. stop, a 32-ft. stop, and a 2-ft. stop, of the organ.

11. State the pitch of this note  on a Twelfth, or Duodecima stop.

12. Write the scale of the Ecclesiastical Phrygian Mode for one octave, beginning from
TO CHRISTINE NILSSON.

Not in Italia was thy beauty born,
Nor gave Hesperides thy golden hair;
But from a sterner clime thy graces rare
Flashed with the Norse star to the southern morn.
And twin kind fairies on thy natal day conspire,
And with their priceless gifts they thee endow,
Melpomene with laurel wreaths thy brow,
While Orpheus, willing, sends the sacred lyre.
Who that has seen thy Marguerite can say
He has not smiled with her when she was gay?
Or, when deserted, frantic, and in tears,
Has not grieved for her and her blighted years?
To genius do thy many charms belong,
Ideal actress!—peerless Queen of Song!

Glasgow, 30th November, 1875. D. D. ROBERTSON.

MUNICH.—Herr Edmund Kretschmer's new opera, Die Folkunger, has been produced at the Theatre Royal. The composer has taken for models Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. The second act is the best. The composer-conductor, Herr Levy, and representatives of the principal parts, especially Herr and Mad. Vogl, were much applauded.

GREGORIAN FESTIVAL.

(From the "Richmond and Twickenham Times," November 20.)

The first part of the service was intoned by the Rev. C. T. Procter, followed after the anthem by the Rev. H. W. Miller, and the lessons were read by Mr E. Cecil Hertslet, licensed reader, and the Rev. H. Walter Miller.

The Right Rev. Bishop Jenner, D.D., preached from the words, "Because he gave not God the glory." After some introductory observations the preacher said that, as a rule, people did not, or would not, understand the objects of the London Gregorian Choral Association. There were not only misunderstandings but prejudices, and often misrepresentations of their motives. That was one reason why, on almost every occasion when a preacher was required, or privileged, to address a mixed congregation on the subject of that association and its objects, a tone more or less apologetic was assumed, and seemed almost to be demanded. They might say that their principles needed no apology; they spoke for themselves. They might know what their intentions were, but so long as these prejudices existed, so long, in short, as they were—as no doubt they were at present—in the minority, so long would this tone of apology and defence of their principles be required. They also needed to be perpetually reminded themselves of what their principles were, and what they pledged them to. Many had forgotten this, and many who were with them at first had thought the principles of plain song and Gregorian psalmody dull and heavy. They had wearied of them and turned aside, if they might so use the Apostles' words, to "vain jangling." That was because they had not given their hearts to it, for this music must be apprehended far more by the heart than by the ear. It was often thrown in their teeth that they made Gregorian music a kind of religion, and indeed it was a kind of religion. There was no attempt at ear tickling; there was no hankering after novelty, because there was no need to be perpetually stimulating musical talent. It represented a religion of self-restraint and self-denial, and what was that religion but Christianity itself? They might say that Gregorian music had a beauty of its own which might be apprehended by all cultivated musicians; it had a grandeur of its own, but if they wanted merely to gratify their musical taste they should choose something very different. A quarter of a century ago it was said that a man who liked Gregorian music was one who preferred bad music to good. They knew better than that, and by such meetings they hoped to convince such that there was something in Gregorian music which had a merit and could be apprehended by the heart, if men would only set aside their prejudices. The Bishop then proceeded to urge the singers before him to give God the glory in all their singing, and not to consult their own tastes and preferences. The music to which they had devoted themselves was pre-eminently calculated to set forth the glory of God, but was it having that effect? It breathed the very minds of the saints, it was like them—calm and self-possessed. Even if it were true that it was harsh and monotonous outwardly, was it not, to speak reverently, in this respect like Him of whom it was said that when they should see Him there was "no beauty that they should desire Him." They were making progress with their churches, but they must also see that the hearts of the people were improved. He could not help remembering the time—more than six-and-thirty years ago—when he was an habitual worshipper in that church; and to see the improvement in the arrangements and in the heartiness of the service in which they had just joined was something almost miraculous. But still, they mus see that the improvement of their hearts kept pace with that o their churches. In conclusion he exhorted the choristers and organists not to think of their own ability, but to give God the glory.

The decorations of the church were very pretty. Above the altar, at the base of the east window, there was a thick bank of banvardias, white chrysanthemums, heaths, arums, scarlet geraniums, and ferns. Rising from this bank was a large cross composed of white chrysanthemums and scarlet geraniums. The altar bases contained white camelias, eucharis, gardiniers, white chrysanthemums, scarlet geraniums, white hyacinths, maiden hair fern and white lilac sent specially from Nice. Above the white and gold hangings on each side of the altar were white chrysanthemums, scarlet geraniums, ferns, &c. The prayer desk, pulpit, and gas standards were decorated with roses, white chrysanthemums, scarlet geraniums, hyacinths, arums, white lilac, and ferns. A cross of white chrysanthemums rose from the font, and at the base of the cross were lovely arums, white chrysanthemums, and rare ferns.

CHRISTINE NILSSON'S VALENTINE.

(From the "Glasgow Herald," December 2.)

Last night, on the occasion of Madame Christine Nilsson's benefit, when she appeared in the Theatre Royal as Valentine in the Huguenots, the enormous house was crammed in every part. Additional seats were put down all over the place, and standing room was eagerly paid for; yet the crowds, clamorous for admission, could not be accommodated, and in consequence many had to be refused admission. When Madame Nilsson intimated her intention of appearing in London as Verdi's Leonora there was a considerable shaking of heads at a step which many considered would prove disastrous to the fair prima donna. The din then raised, however, was mildness itself to the storm which burst over Mad. Nilsson's head when it was announced that she would essay the great part of Valentine. Never was hue and cry more vigorously raised, and for the time Mad. Nilsson became a martyr. All sorts of reasons were adduced why she should not and could not satisfactorily undertake the rôle. First of all came the plea of "vested rights"—that Mad. Nilsson ought not to attempt to occupy ground so long possessed by others. This line of argument could not stand reflection; but another was readily found. It was said that Mad. Nilsson's physique was not suited to the character. On consideration, however, it was found that this objection was even weaker than the other, for no law had been laid down whereby it was enacted that none but certain prime donne should be even permitted to try and give a reading of Meyerbeer's greatest creation. Nothing daunted by the growlings with which her intention was received, Mad. Nilsson, by reason of indomitable pluck, which on many occasions has stood her in good stead, stuck to her resolve, and in July last year appeared on the Drury Lane boards in the part over which there had been so much wrangling. A notice of the memorable performance, written at the time by one of the first critics of the day (after explaining that at first, for several causes outside of Mad. Nilsson's performance, the issue was doubtful) said among other things:—

"There only remained to save the performance the great duet for Valentine and Raoul, and this Mad. Nilsson did by an effort which we can only recognise as splendid. Throwing herself heart and soul into the situation, singing with a passion and tenderness rarely surpassed, and acting with a natural power sufficient to place her in the first rank of tragic artists, Mad. Nilsson laid the audience at her feet in an attitude of homage. No victory more complete was ever gained in so short a time."

Subsequent representations tended to strengthen the favourable opinion thus expressed.

The story of Les Huguenots is so well known that our duty is restricted to a brief account of last evening's performance. From the very outset of the opera it was apparent that the immense assembly had gathered almost for no other reason than to hear Mad. Nilsson. At all events, the whole of the first act, except when Mad. Trebelli appeared, was listened to with indifference. Neither Signor Gillandi (Raoul) nor Herr Behrens (Marcel) could obtain more than a respectful hearing. Indeed, it was not till the grand duet for Valentine and Marcel in the third act was reached that interest was fully aroused. Here, however, there was no resisting the splendid singing and spontaneous acting of Mad. Nilsson, which richly merited the ovation awarded to her. Still this was only the means to an end, for it was not till the grand love duet between Valentine and Raoul that Mad. Nilsson displayed her full strength. Then she had the audience under absolute sway, and, as movement followed movement of the most impassioned of love scenes, the audience were enraptured, and at the termination of the act a second ovation of greater length and intensity was offered to the fair Swede. She was called out three times—a marked honour rarely witnessed so far North.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The first of Mr Stockley's third series of "Orchestral Concerts" was fairly but not fully attended, and justified the remark that the Birmingham public requires the attraction of "stars" to ensure anything like financial success. True, the band, mainly composed of local professors, is far short of perfection, their opportunities for combined practice being, like angels' visits, "few, and far between;" but, were greater encouragement accorded to the spirited efforts of such caterers as Mr Stockley, concerts of a high-class character would be more frequently given, and a proportionate improvement expected. The most important feature in the programme on this occasion was Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakspere's Midsummer Night's Dream; and, as the immortal bard was a Warwickshire man, and the equally immortal musician's fame is no less closely allied to the county, by his great work, Elijah, having been first introduced to the world at a Birmingham Festival, the "eternal fitness of things" could have hardly been more adequately celebrated. That the execution of this marvellous production of genius left much to be desired, on the score of delicacy and requisite attention to light and shade, cannot be denied, the absence of the first oboe, the defective intonation of the horns (notably in the Notturno), the substitution of cornets for trumpets (whereby the Wedding March suffered considerably), being all more or less drawbacks to the general effect. An overture by Suppé, entitled Poet and Peasant, consisting mainly of two waltz movements and a romance for violoncello (charmingly played by Herr Daubert), reminded me of a remark once made by that excellent musician, Molique, who, on hearing an overture named "Peace and War," observed, "Which was the peace and which was the war, I have not know." Sullivan's tuneful overture, "Di Ballo," written for the Birmingham Festival of 1870, and Mozart's overture to the Clemenza di Tito, were also included in the scheme, as was Handel's Concerto in F major (No. 4), for organ and full orchestra, the solo instrument being in the able hands of Mr Stimpson. Strange to say, this was the first time in the annals of Birmingham that an organ concerto has ever been heard in its entirety. Herr Daubert contributed Schumann's Abendlied for violoncello (exquisitely played), with the accompaniments by Herr Joachim, who has therein shown himself as thorough a master of orchestral resources as he is facile princeps, emperor indeed of the violin. Miss Blanche Cole was called back to receive the plaudits which followed her rendering of Gounod's Ave Maria, in which the violin and organ obbligati were ably sustained by Mr J. M. Abbott and Mr Stimpson respectively, the work (a false start allowed for) going, on the whole, fairly well. Mr Barton McGuckin, a new tenor, whose voice is more euphonious than his name, created a favourable impression in the recitative, "And God created man," and subsequent air, "In native worth," from Haydn's Creation; being later on encored in Balfe's serenade "Good night, beloved." Mr McGuckin (who is said to hail from Manchester, but of Irish extraction) possesses an organ of good quality and compass, well worth cultivating, but at present somewhat crude and amateurish, which defects diligent study and continuous practice will no doubt go far to correct and improve.

Messrs Harrison's Second Popular Concert was densely crowded, Mr Sims Reeves having been originally announced to take part in it. Unfortunately the cold caught during his recent engagement at the Brighton Theatre prevented our great tenor from appearing—a fact which was, on the morning of the concert, duly notified in all the local daily papers; and Mr Cummings, at the shortest notice, ably filled the place of the absentee, singing "Deeper and deeper still," "Waft her, angels," "Good-bye, sweetheart," etc., with his accustomed care and musicianly skill. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Madame Patey fully sustained their reputation, and well deserved the applause which waited upon their respective efforts. The instrumental portion of the programme was, however, more than ordinarily conspicuous by the fact of Madame Essipoff making her first appearance before a Birmingham audience, and, it need hardly be said, with most complete and unqualified success. Her solos included "Nocturne," "Mazourke," and "Etude," by Chopin, and Liszt's "Chant Polonais," and "Ronde des lutins," in addition to which she took part in Schubert's trio in B flat, with MM. Sainton and Lassere, and Beethoven's sonata for pianoforte and violin, in C minor, Op. 30, No. 2. Since Madame Arabella Goddard last delighted us with her presence, no such pianist as Madame Essipoff has been heard in the Town Hall; and the wish was earnestly expressed that, in their next series of concerts, the talented Russian (or Polish?) lady may not be omitted from the engagements made by Messrs Harrison. M. Sainton is an old and deserved favourite here—as, indeed, he is everywhere—and his Romance and Tarantelle were received with deserved favour and hearty applause. Mr Lindsay Sloper fulfilled the office of accompanist, besides taking part in Reissiger's trio with MM. Sainton and Lassere, with credit to himself and satisfaction to his hearers.

The third concert of the series will take place on December 21st, when Madlle Albani, Madlle Zaré Thalberg, and Herr Wilhelmj are announced among the principal attractions. As the Town Hall will, early in the ensuing year, be given up to the decorators and builders, important alterations in the entrances, waiting-rooms, etc., having to be made before the Festival of 1876 can be held, the musical season will have to be concentrated into a shorter space of time than usual. ALEXANDRA PALACE.

The fourth of the new series of Saturday Popular Concerts took place last Saturday, the 20th inst., and was well attended—better, perhaps, than were the equally attractive Summer Concerts during the past season. A glance at the list of music for performance showed that the spirit of enterprise which characterised the direction of these entertainments from the first is by no means abandoned. Including, among other well-known works of celebrated composers, Sterndale Bennett's beautiful overture, "The Naiades," the concert was agreeably varied by vocal contributions from Mdme Blanche Cole, Miss Emily Mott, and Mr Edward Lloyd. Out of fourteen pieces in the programme, no less than four were comparatively new to an English audience. Of these the first—a "Pièce Symphonique," by M. Devin-Duvivier, a composer who, by his birth on British soil, his French parentage and proclivities, might be claimable both sides of the Channel—bore out its title of "Le Triomphe de Bacchus," in so far that it included a triumphal march and a rustic dance, cleverly if not very attractively orchestrated. The second—a Preludio e Tempodi Valse, for pianoforte with orchestra, played and composed by Signor Tito Mattei in the brilliant and showy style naturally to be expected of the author of the popular "Valse de Concert" and other pianoforte pieces—abounded with executive intricacies so effective that the composer-executant was rewarded by a unanimous recall. The third was a "Tarantella" for stringed instruments, by M. Halberstadt, which will be better judged after a second hearing; and the fourth, a "Suite" for orchestra, by the French composer, M. Jules Massenet, leads us to hope for further acquaintance with his works. Each of the four movements—"Marche," "Air de Ballet," "Angelus," and "Fête Bohême,"—marred as they are in several instances by over-anxiety to produce the effect desired by the composer—owe their refined grace, their touching charm, to poetical genius. Except in the "Air de Ballet," where the scheme of modulation is more original, the mannerism which is so monotonous in the works of many modern French composers is almost unpleasantly conspicuous. The "Fête Bohême," long before its close, quits the realm of music for that of noise; and there are other defects that prove how genuine the power must be that, weighted with such drawbacks, can yet be intensely felt. It is not a matter of wonder that, when such novelties as these are produced at the Alexandra Palace, week after week, that a preponderance of musicians should be de règle among the audience. For many years the works given by our various orchestral societies have been heard to repletion, and the selections from the modern German school, so repeatedly given, merely serve to make the public accept gratefully its former pleasing, if monotonous fare. Therefore, when a skilled conductor like Mr Weist Hill makes use of his powers to refresh the wearied public ear, and console it with the promise that "Melody yet reigns, and the day of future chaos has still to dawn," a vote of thanks is due to him from musicians collectively, while individually few will fail heartily to bid him "Go on, and prosper!" A STUDY OF HAMLET.*

This book is a striking instance of the veneration of Shakspere entertained at the present day, in contrast to the not always continuous respect paid to him in the last century. How would Johnson, Malone, and Stevens have stared had they read the words which Mr Marshall put on the very first page of his preface!—"Those I would fain have as my readers are those who love Shakspere as one who has added to the beauty and happiness of life; who reverence his mind as one of those precious gifts of God to the world; whose beings, born of Fancy indeed, but, nevertheless, real in their nobleness and purity, may spring to gladden the hearts of those whose earthly lot it is to find few friends save in the realms of imagination."

The language may be somewhat high-flown, but any one imbued with the modern spirit may perceive that it exactly corresponds to the feeling of the time. The rage for seeing Shakspere on the stage seemed to be dying out till it was resuscitated at the Lyceum Theatre a twelvemonth ago; but the reverence for Shakspere as a poet whose works are to be accepted as something almost beyond criticism is a plant of comparatively recent growth. Our play-going fathers took the plays mentioned in the programme as a matter of course, but whether they had the genuine article, or a mixture towards which Cibber, Garrick, or Tate furnished ingredients, was a question which troubled them little, if at all.

Mr Marshall's "Study," which is in four parts, sprang from a couple of lectures, which he gave before the Catholic Young Men's Association, and which he felt were too short to comprise all that he wanted to say. He modestly confesses in his preface that, though he has studied Hamlet more or less for the last 14 years, he never knew till he began sincerely to bring his work to the shape which it now bears how scanty was his knowledge of the subject he had undertaken to illustrate. He says:—"One of my principal objects will have been gained if I can induce any of my readers to study the text of Shakspere's plays more carefully and with a higher aim than mere verbal criticism; they will find that he is himself his best commentator, and that such study will open to them new fields of enjoyment."

Mr Marshall, to perform his task, takes the play into his hand, and expounds it to his readers scene by scene, we may almost say, speech by speech, as if he were making them acquainted with something of which they knew nought before Dr Johnson's remark with reference to the tragedy, that "the incidents are so numerous that the argument of the play would make a long tale," here receives full illustration. The argument, as given by Mr Marshall, is indeed a very long tale, further lengthened by his exposition, always shrewd and to the purpose, of the motives of the personages. Whatsoever they say or do he is close upon them, prepared to explain what they are saying or doing. Opinions may differ as to the correctness of his portraiture; that he has produced a highly-finished and consistent picture of character no one can doubt.

That in portraying the idiosyncrasy of the Royal Dane he has been guided by the lamp of Goethe is obvious enough, though, as he shows upon occasion, he has but scant respect for his illuminator. The man with a big task set before him, and with weak resolution to perform it, with which the world was first made really acquainted when "Wilhelm Meister Lehrjahre" was a new book, is here presented to the view, depicted with the utmost regard to detail; but Mr Marshall strikes out for himself a new path when he constantly draws attention to the intrinsic nobility of Hamlet's nature. He admits that the Prince has his shortcomings when action is required of him; but he will not have his moral rectitude called into question. The revolting sentiments expressed in the soliloquy, "Now might I do it pat," &c., he attributes (rightly, we think), not to fiendish malignity, but to a desperate attempt to find a motive for inaction; though, be it observed, he recommends the omission of the scene in which the speech occurs. The assertion of Dr Johnson, that in the apology made to Laertes in the last scene of the play ("Give me your pardon, Sir," &c.), Hamlet shelters himself in falsehood, inasmuch as he excuses a manifest outrage on the plea of a madness, which was only assumed, is met by Mr Marshall with the counter-assertion that the madness to which the Prince here refers is not the "antic disposition" he deliberately "put on," but another madness, the "sore distraction" into which the calamities of his life had driven him, and, above all, the anguish which he felt on suddenly hearing of Ophelia's death. He contrives to make as good a case as he can out of the death of the two courtiers, Rosencrantz and Guilderstein, though here he obviously finds himself in a difficulty. "It is possible that Shakspere meant to mark as strongly as he could the hatred of a noble, honest nature for that complicity in crime which is the result of wilful blindness and self-interested negligence."

The possibility to which Mr Marshall refers cannot be called in question, but the defence is not very strong after all, especially when it comes from an advocate who shows himself so powerful in the prosecution of Laertes as one of the worst of scoundrels. To this Mr Marshall is stimulated by the very lenient manner in which Laertes is treated by Gervinus, and few, we think, will deny that he has the best of the argument. Mr Marshall's definition of the irresolution proper to Hamlet, to which Goethe first gave due importance, is accute. It may be attributed to moral timidity, or it may be attributed, as it is by Mr Irving, to a tenderness of nature which shrinks from the commission of murder. Prompted by a remark made to him by Signor Salvini in the course of a private conversation, "L'Amleto c'è il dubbio," Mr Marshall arrives at the conclusion that the principal flaw in the Prince's character is the want of humility, and consequently of faith, meaning by humility "a complete subordination of one's own prejudices and desires and will to some great purpose, and a belief so thorough and unquestioning in the justice of that purpose as to render any hesitation in one's efforts to accomplish it impossible." Had Hamlet been endowed with this quality, he would have been convinced that the Ghost's charge of vengeance was to be fulfilled at any cost. "Such humility," he cautiously observes, "does not always lend itself to the accomplishment of great or good ends; the fanatic shares it with the enthusiast, the assassin with the liberator." Let us add that the duty which Hamlet is enjoined to perform is the duty of assassination, wholly unrecognised in the civilised Europe of the present day, and of very dubious stringency in the 17th century. The Hamlet of the play does not belong to the mythical period of which Saxo Grammaticus was the historian, and in which a Corsican vendetta may be presumed to have existed, in consonance with the natural order of things, but lives at some imaginary Court, with the sentiments of which an English Elizabethan gentleman might be supposed to sympathise.

The fair fame of Ophelia is triumphantly cleared by Mr Marshall of the imputations cast upon it by Goethe, who is, to a certain extent, followed by Gervinus. This is done in an appendix; but we may here take occasion to remark that the appendices which follow the "study" are, for the most part, as important as the text which they supplement, and comprise an "early life of Hamlet," most ingeniously constructed out of materials furnished by the play. One curious inaccuracy in the estimation of Goethe's comment upon Ophelia should not, however, pass unnoticed. "'Wilhelm Meister,'" says Mr Marshall, "is a work written by one advanced in years, in which we find all the cynicism and selfishness of old age coupled with an amount of animal passion which youth alone could excuse." No doubt there is plenty of cynicism and of animal passion to be found in the world-famed romance, but it was not written by one advanced in years. The composition of "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre," to which the animadversion would alone apply, was frequently interrupted, and extended over a period beginning with 1777, when the author's age was 26, and ending in 1796, when, consequently, his years numbered 47. Mr Marshall has, probably, been misled by the date of the sequel, "Wilhelm Meister's Wanderjahre," which was not completed till 1821, and reconstructed in 1829. However, the vindicator of Ophelia carries out his main point, and gives good reason for his opinion that she is "Shakspere's most perfect picture of virginity, as Desdemona and Imogen are his faultless pictures of true wifehood."

Those who are in earnest with their Shakspere may profitably pass an hour or two in the perusal of this very interesting "study."—Times.

PURPLE POWIS.—What, dear Baylis, in a musical sense, is the difference between "solicitor" and "attorney?"

BAYLIS BOIL.—Dear Purple, I don't know.

PURPLE POWIS.—What, dear Boil, is the difference between law and equity?

BAYLIS BOIL.—Ah! dear Powis, that's easy:—

Equity's not Law, and Law's not Equity.

COLOGNE.—In the course of the winter, the Association for Sacred Music will, under the direction of its conductor, Herr Eduard Mertke, give three performances with solos, orchestra, and chorus. Among the more important works will be a "Magnificat" by Philip Emanuel Bach; Rossini's Stabat Mater, and Ein Deutsches Requiem, by Johannes Brahms. In order to place the concerts within reach of the masses, the prices of admission will be lowered.

BRUSSELS.

(From our Correspondent.)

In consequence of Mad. Lucca's inability to put in an appearance owing to the accident which lately happened to her, L'Africaine has been produced at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie with another lady, Mdlle Vanden Berghen, as Selika. Mdlle Vanden Berghen is a great favourite here, but she would never have become so, had she made her début in this character. The other characters were represented by MM. Warot and Devoyod.

After a lapse of some seventeen or eighteen years, Grisar's little comic opera, Les Travestissements, has been revived. It was not very well received. Mad. Morlet, like Mdlle Vanden Berghen, in L'Africaine, was not strong enough for the leading female rôle. The lady acts well; but something more than acting is needed in opera. Then, too, the orchestra left much to be desired. The rough manner in which they played Grisar's light and airy music suggested the action of a man who should set about engraving a delicate drawing on wood with a mason's chisel.

Offenbach's Madame l'Archiduc has been brought out at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, with Mdlle Théo in the principal part.

PARIS SCRAPS.

(From our Parisian Scrapper.)

While tolerably certain of saving M. Faure's life, Dr Lowe was far from feeling the same assurance that his patient's voice would not suffer irretrievably. Fortunately, all fear on the subject has been dispelled. Faure has returned triumphantly to the Grand Opera in the full possession of his vocal resources. Such being the case, it is superfluous to say how he sang. His acting, too, was as fine as ever. The opera was M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet. Faure had a tremendous reception from the public, who seemed scarcely to know in what manner they could testify sufficiently their pleasure at greeting so popular and deserving a favourite. Mad. Carvalho resumed her part of Ophelia, and shared the applause so lavishly bestowed on Faure. Mdlle Rosina Bloch proved a satisfactory substitute for Mad. Gueymard, as the Queen. The latter lady had been suddenly summoned to Brussels in consequence of the death of her father, M. Paul Lauters, a highly-esteemed and well-known painter, who expired in that capital on the 12th inst., after a long illness.

At the Opéra-Comique, Carmen, the work of that promising young composer, Georges Bizet, so prematurely snatched away from art, has been revived, with every mark of success, before an audience that filled every part of the house. Mad. Galli-Marié sustained her original character of the heroine, and Mdlle Chapuy that of Michaela. Mesdlles Nadaud, Bell, MM. Potel Duvernoy, Bouhy, Lhéri, and Barnolt, also, were included in the cast.

M. du Locle, who has been in a bad state of health for a considerable time, has gone to pass a month in Egypt. Meanwhile, M. Charles Nuitter will replace him as manager af the Opéra-Comique.

La Reine Indigo has been revived at the Théâtre de la Renaissance, with Mad. Peschard in the part created by Mdlle Zulmar Bouffar, when the opera was first brought out. Herr Johann Strauss desired very much to attend the rehearsals. He was prevented by illness from doing so. He will, however, visit Paris this winter to superintend the production of his new opera.

The Théâtre-Lyrique has at length found a home. The home in question will be the Théâtre de la Gaîté, and the manager, chosen by the Committee of the Academy of Fine Arts, is M. Albert Vizentini. The transformation, however, will not be actually effected until after the run of the Voyage dans la Lune, and when that will be it is impossible to say. It was necessary to settle several important points before M. Vizentini's appointment could be officially ratified. In the first place, there were his engagements with his predecessor, M. Offenbach, and the proprietors of the Theatre, and, dependent upon these engagements, the question of the rate at which he was entitled to receive the subsidy voted by the Assembly for the new lyric establishment. In addition to these knotty points, at present satisfactorily solved, the entire company has to be formed, and so has the repertory. All things considered, it appears scarcely probable that the first season of the resuscitated Théâtre-Lyrique will begin, as some persons say it will, next March.

The following letter has been addressed by the Minister of Fine Arts to Sig. Rossi:

"Department of the Ministry of Public Instruction, Worship, and Fine Arts.

"Sir.—May I beg you to accept the Sèvres tazza, which I forward herewith, as a memento of your visit to Paris, and as a mark of homage which I am happy to pay to your distinguished talent.—I remain, Sir, etc. "Wallon."

Accompanying this flattering epistle was a handsome vase in Sèvres china.

DEATH OF HOWARD GLOVER.

(From Watson's "Art Journal"—New York.)

To Mr. Henry C. Watson.

Mr Howard Glover, the well-known British composer, died, on the 28th inst., at his residence; after a severe and lingering sickness, which had grown rapidly worse within the last two or three weeks. The scene at his deathbed was one which leaves an impression on the minds of those who witnessed the sad affair which time can never erase. Surrounded by his sorrowing family and a few friends, Howard Glover suffered the most intense agony for twelve hours previous to his death. All night long this truly great and much-abused man lay upon his bed of pain, and tried hard to speak a parting word to his family, but, added to his many other misfortunes, his loss of speech rendered him perfectly helpless. Standing by the bedside of this man, whom it was the will of God to take away in the very prime of life, many sad reflections came into the mind of the writer. The inevitable separation of this peaceful and hitherto happy family; the heart-rending conviction that other lives may be swiftly shortened by this misfortune; the thought of these friendless girls thrown out upon their own resources, in this cold world, to battle against jealousy, hatred, scorn, and disappointments—all left their life-long impressions on the mind.

Misfortune has followed Mr Glover since he first came to this country, seven years ago. The many beautiful songs and ballads composed by Mr Glover, and published by Messrs Peters, Ditson, Pond, and Hall, may be found in the parlours of our most refined society; also numerous operas, and other large musical works. In some cases the honours due to Mr Glover for his compositions have been attributed to other parties. The effect upon his mind produced by these things had a tendency to shorten his days. In his last rational moments he spoke of Mr John Brougham in affectionate terms. Mr Glover was a man of tender feelings, and appreciated the friendship of Mr Brougham. He was fond of his home and his family, of an affectionate, kind-hearted, and forgiving nature.

It is a most unfortunate circumstance that Mr Glover, after his life of toil and deserved honours, should pass his last moments in poverty and misery. Mr Glover's family are celebrated as theatrical people. He descended from the well-known family of Betterton, of British fame. His daughter, Miss Nellie Glover, has for years been under his instruction, and is deserving of much credit for her musical talent. She has exhibited a love for the divine art from early childhood. Mr Glover was born in London, England. He was 56 years of age.

CRITERION THEATRE.

On Saturday afternoon the first of a series of three private performances (having no connection with the regular business or the regular company of the theatre) was attended by a numerous and select audience. The entertainment consisted of a comic opera in three acts, the music composed by Herr Adolph Gollmick, for many years favourably known in this country as a teacher of the pianoforte, and also as a composer for that instrument. Herr Gollmick, like others in the same position, would fain take a higher flight. To compose operas, and have them performed in public, is the aspiration of many a professor condemned by circumstances to employ his time almost exclusively in less ambitious pursuits. Herr Gollmick respects his art, and desires to make known that his powers are not limited to one particular sphere. If Doña Constanza, played for the gratification of his friends on the present occasion, be not a masterpiece, it at least shows capacity to excel in operatic composition, which, with more frequent opportunity, might lead to results not inconsiderable. Herr Gollmick exhibits more than ordinary skill in writing for voices, as well as in the treatment of orchestral instruments; and throughout Doña Constanza the hand of a practised adept is apparent. There are no choruses; but the voices of the leading singers are frequently brought together in the most effective manner—as an instance of which may be cited the finale to Act 1st, when the dramatis personæ—seven in number—are both separately and simultaneously engaged. We have heard less spirited pieces signed by names more widely recognized. In fact, there is a great deal of genuine concerted writing in each of the three acts—not merely clever, by the way, but occasionally even dramatic. In addition to this, more than one solo might be named that, if heard from time to time, could scarcely fail to meet with general approval. Into closer particulars it is needless to enter. Herr Gollmick has not been furnished with a libretto admitting any great variety of musical development in the style conventionally accepted as "comic opera." The materials upon which it is constructed borne in mind, it is drawn out to unreasonable length; and the issue can be readily anticipated before the plot has advanced half way. The scene, as may be guessed from the title, is laid in Spain; and the story, somewhat improbable, and for the most part wanting in dramatic interest, is of the simplest. To give a detailed account of it would be filling space to no purpose, and we must be satisfied with congratulating Herr Gollmick on having made so much out of so little. The performance, though by no means irreproachable, was in many respects good. Miss Annie Sinclair, whose appearance again on the London boards is welcome, sang and acted the part of the heroine, Doña Constanza, with grace and animation; Miss Emily Pitt, as Doña Barbara Munez, was an excellent "comprimaria;" while the remaining characters were more or less effectively sustained by Miss Dolores Drummond, Messrs W. Courtenay, F. Penna, Connell, and Wakeford. The orchestra, though comparatively small, was efficient, and its part in the performance, one of responsibility, was all that could be desired. The opera was throughout favourably received, and the composer summoned forward at the conclusion.—Times.

From Tewkesbury.

Could it but be that thou loved'st me
Could it but be that thou loved'st me
The Heav'ns above would blaze
With scorching blinding rays
The stars would meet and kiss
In fiery godlike bliss
The moaning trees would cease
The flowers again have peace
The midnight deathdark stream
Would brighten into gleam
The trembling soul would leap
Like broken heart from sleep
The whisp'ring leaves would breathe
Of hope to all that grieve
The waves flow into each
The pow'r of love to teach
The sea would hush and smile
To love with me awhile
Could it but be
Could it but be
Could it but be Ame-Alas!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

HYPERCROTCHET.—For Generali read Mosca, and for Mosca read Generali—crescendo a crescendo.

D. C. L.—Mr Townshend Smith's address is "The Close, Hereford." It is there (D. V.) he will conduct the Festival of 1876.

GROGNON.—Certainly, on the Felsted School argument, we—until better reasons are given—hold with Mr Grignon. Another instance of the advisability of harmony (that signifies Music), being diligently taught in public schools.

DR TURTLE.—No. Dussek died in 1812, Mozart in 1791, Mendelssohn in 1847. On every other point Dr Turtle is wrong. Pixis was not Kalkbrenner (good thing for both), nor was Kalkbrenner Pixis (good thing for either).

DR QUERY.—The overture to Lord Byron's Corsair was dedicated by its composer, Hector Berlioz, to his friend, J. W. Davison—as may be seen by the printed score. Dr Query is wrong about Il Giuramento, which was composed, not by Pacini, but by Mercadante. The Schiava in Bagdad was, no doubt, Pacini's; but not Aureliano in Palmyra, the veritable composer of which opera was Rossini. In every other respect Dr Query has been misinformed.

TOM FLYM.—Read (if you can) Balzac's Modeste Mignon, and you will see that people can write to people without knowing what "people" means. Read also Louis Lambert, and you will see that the Swedenborgian faith is not without charm. Read, moreover, Le Père Goriot, and you will see that there can be a Lear without a Cordelia. Read, finally, the Recherche de l'Absolu, and you will admit that Balshazar Claes was but one of many fools. Mr Flym confounds Pulci with Ariosto.

DEATH.

On November 18th, at 6, Albert Mansions, Victoria Street, S.W., the infant son of Madame Marie Roze Perkins.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SIR,—Curiosity plays a great part in the affairs of this world. In fact, we may very fairly apply to it the lines—

"Æquo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas, written by Horace of something else to which wretched Humanity is subject. It was curiosity which prompted the last Mrs Blue Beard to enter a certain chamber, of which she dropped the key, a circumstance resulting in the discovery by Blue Beard of what she had done, and of her being doomed by him to instant death. It is curiosity which induces juvenile horticulturists to dig up, after the lapse of a day or so, the seeds they have sown, that they may see how the said seeds are getting on. Curiosity has caused many a pair of bellows to be cut open, that the operator might learn whence the wind came; and to curiosity must be set down the fact that so many dolls are eviscerated in their prime, and shed their life's sawdust prematurely on the floor of the nursery.

The same feeling, only purified and ennobled by reverence and admiration, renders us so desirous of learning all we can about great and justly-celebrated individuals, not regarded as Emperors, Kings, Generals, Statesmen, Poets, Painters, Divines, or Musicians, as the case may be, but considered as men. When we have read about high deeds of arms or peace, which have changed the aspect of the world, we would fain extend our knowledge of those by whom they were effected. The recollection of Trafalgar impels us to peruse, again and yet again, the adventure of a young midshipman, named Horatio Nelson, with the Polar Bear, in the ice-bound regions of the far North. With what delight do we not treasure up every detail connected with the "grit bare-legged laddie" who was so fond of animals; who had tame blackbirds flying unconfined about the poor cottage in which he lived; and who, as George Stephenson, the famous engineer, has given a fresh impetus to civilisation throughout the globe! Who would have missed the account which informs us how a young scapegrace once climbed to the top of the lofty steeple of Market Drayton Church, and terrified the inhabitants by sitting complacently on a stone spout near the summit! But then the name of that young scapegoat was Robert Clive, without whom, and without certain victories, among which was one achieved at a place called Plassey, His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, would not, in all probability, have been hunting lately with the cheetah, or pig-sticking with the Guikwar, at Baroda.

Genius sanctifies, as it were, every one and every thing with whom or which it comes in contact. Like the prophet's rod, at whose touch the water poured forth from the sterile rock, it enables us to derive the keenest enjoyment and profoundest delight from objects which we should otherwise have treated with indifference. The veriest trifle, if it ever belonged to or emanated from a Shakspere or a Cromwell, a Beethoven or a Michael Angelo, is, for loving minds, a priceless treasure. It is with a firm conviction of this truth that I beg to bring under your notice the following letter. I am sure it will be gratefully received by every one who admires the immortal composer of Don Giovanni, and Die Zauberflöte, of Le Nozze and the Requiem. Here it is:—

I cannot explain the allusion to Blanchard—he may have been an acrobat, the Blondin of the last century. Nor do I know what is meant by Tischnarren—I suspect it is a fault of transcription—but that does not prevent my reading easily and distinctly in the above lines the character of him who penned them. What tender affection! What childlike simplicity! What innocent gaity! How different is such a letter from the effusions of certain would-be celebrities who depict themselves in their correspondence exactly as they love to be depicted by others in their portraits, with their eyes cast up to heaven, with their hair in admired disorder, and with a pen, a brush, a scroll, or something of the sort, in their hand, the whole surmounted by an abnormal development of forehead, perfectly in keeping with their inflated pretentions, but ludicrously too expansive for their supply of brains—a sort of frontal Pantechnicon to house a pauper's furniture. How different is the tone adopted by genius—grand, sublime, and passionate genius!

Who can refrain from being moved by the eager solicitude which Mozart exhibits for his "Dearest, best, little Wife;" by his protestations how he would endure any extremity rather than that she should not be happy; by his assurance that the reward to which he looks forward, after all his troubles, is to rest once more in her arms, and then to know, as we do know, that, almost

(To Dishley Peters, Esq.)

MY DEAR D. P.,—Now that you have returned from visiting the "Mudidis Euri resolutæ flatibus Alpes," as our Lucian has it; now that, after revelling, during the late most hotestest (new form of superlative, introduced by me into the neologisms of the English idiom, to meet the meteorological exigences of last summer), I repeat: now that, after revelling, during the late most hotestest weather, in those pleasantest regions ("Acris sævit ubi frigore semper hyems"), you are once more back in the classic neighbourhood of Tadcaster, I haste to greet you, and to request——that (&c.). As Wright observed, in days of yore, when there was a question of the kind of malt liquour to be fetched:—"Make it Ale!" So I say: "Make it HALF AND HALF!"—Yours, obsequiously, Paul Moist.

CHRISTINE NILSSON IN DUBLIN.

(From "Freeman's Journal," Nov. 20.)

The benefit of Madame Nilsson last night was unparalleled in many ways. At seven minutes past seven the popular portions of the house, galleries and pit, were absolutely packed; and, in addition to this phenomenon, all those who had booked "chairs" were seated so as to have the advantage over those who had taken tickets for the corridor. About seventy stools were put into nooks in the circle, and even then there were two or three scores of people outside who were in sight of the stage at a very sharp angle indeed. For fifty minutes the crowds thronged in, and never, perhaps, were the galleries so overwhelming in appearance and gesticulation. Their conduct, however, was comparatively very good, and their singing not worse than usual. Their vociferous manner of applause was checked, for the first time in our experience, in a very novel manner, and by no less a person than Madame Nilsson herself. Twice or thrice during the evening she peremptorily raised her hand, and silenced them as if by magic, and this with a sweetness and grace which could not be denied. Once, indeed, the comic blundering of a god defeated her. It was in the "Miserere" scene, which was superbly given. The applause was tremendous, and Madame signalled to Signor Li Calsi for a repeat. Slience was quite restored, and one might have heard a sigh in the house. Madame paused; and then there came from the gallery, quite sotto voce, and in an accent of unmistakable Tipperary, "Go on, now!" The lady looked up for an instant, and then burst out laughing, and the whole house roared secundum. This merry hitch excepted, the opera was performed throughout with rapidity and order. It is almost needless to dwell upon the singing of Madame Nilsson. It was quite superb—a marvel of sweetness and light, grace and power. She was frequently encored, and was in a very generous mood. The "Tacea la notte," the "Di tale amor," the "Miserere," the "D'amor suli' ali rosee," were each and all sung with wonderful feeling, while the action was that of intelligence and grace. In the matter of dress, Madame Nilsson outshone all her predecessors; she was brilliantly costumed. The opera concluded in a perfect furore of applause for Madame Nilsson, and, although she appeared twice in obedience to the peremptory thunders of the gods, they would not be appeased. They cried and shouted for the "Last Rose of Summer," and for a considerable time they kept up the demand. Meantime, hundreds had assembled at the stage-door to drag her home in the approved fashion. While the shouting was going on inside, and the enthusiasts were waiting outside, a closely-muffled figure might have been seen gliding along the corridor of the dress-circle among the general public. 'Twas Madame Nilsson, and in quite a swift manner she descended to her carriage, and was probably at home before her admirers had ceased to shout for the Irish melody.

RAVENNA.—A number of musicians and vocalists, headed by Signors Montanari and Gordini, visited, on All Souls' Day, the tomb of the late Sig. Mariani, and laid a crown of laurel upon it. Sig. Montanari, also, read a funeral oration.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MDLLE TIETJENS and Madame Arabella Goddard are at present in Canada. Their first concert (at Montreal) was an extraordinary success.

SIGNOR AND SIGNORA VASSELLI, to whose family Donizetti's wife belonged, have made a present of the composer's piano to the Municipality of Bergamo. The instrument will be placed in the Town Library, and to it will be affixed an extract from an autograph letter in the possession of the Vasselli family, which proves the authenticity of the gift.

M. L. A. MALEMPRÉ, the eminent sculptor, who made the fine statue of Balfe which stands loftily erect in the Drury Lane Theatre vestibule, is now engaged upon a similar work for the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, to be erected in Sheffield, our great musician's native town. It is a fact worth noting that M. Malempré never saw either Balfe or Bennett.

AT the "St Cecilia Festival," in St Paul's Cathedral, the organists were Dr Stainer, Mr G. Martin, Mus. Bac., and Mr C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac. Some inconvenience was experienced in consequence of the choir seats being taken possession of by persons admitted into the chancel, and some difficulty was felt by the ticket holders not finding places owing to want of correspondence between the numbered seats and ticket holders—a difficulty increased by the enormous quantity of applicants for admission.

A MUSICAL amateur of Berlin has just made the Emperor Wilhelm a most valuable present, a collection, namely, of manuscripts by celebrated composers. The collection includes two Quintets by Spohr; a setting of an Italian Song, with Orchestral Accompaniment, by C. M. von Weber; a Symphony by Schubert; and four volumes containing the first plan of the Eighth Symphony by Beethoven. Some passages are written in ink, others in pencil, black or coloured; at times the writing is hurried, and then again it is most scrupulously neat. The entire sketch presents an exceedingly varied appearance, and is extremely difficult to decipher. Certain portions are entirely erased with the remark: So wird es nie etwas ("That will never be worth anything"); or: Das ist nichts ("That's worth nothing"). In one place we read: Ob ich das wiederhslen lasse? ("Shall I repeat this?) These indications of the way in which the composer's first ideas were gradually modified are highly interesting.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

SOUTH LONDON CHORAL ASSOCIATION.—The members of this society held their first subscription concert at the Walworth Lecture Hall, on Monday evening, before an appreciative and demonstrative audience. The soloists were Miss Josephine Cravino, Mad. Arthur, and Mr Fryer. The various pieces were well chosen, and among those deserving special commendation were a recit. and aria from St Paul, charmingly sung by Miss Cravino, and Mad. Arthur's rendering of "Lo, here the gentle lark" with flute obbligato. The best choruses were "Oh! the pleasure of the plains" (Acis and Galatea), and Haydn's "Come, gentle spring." Mr Leonard Venables conducted. At the next concert the Messiah will be given.

BRIXTON.—The Brixton Choral Society opened their winter campaign last week, with a performance of Elijah, at the Angell Town Institution. The Society appeared to great advantage in the choruses, most of which were given in a manner that left little to be desired. There might, perhaps, have been a little more vigour in the dramatic "Baal, we cry to thee," and the two subsequent choruses; but, on the whole, there was not much to find fault with. The solos were safe in the hands of Miss Poyntz, Mdme Poole, Mr Henry Guy, and Mr Wadmore, and in each case the rendering was deserving of the highest praise. Mr Wadmore sang the music of the prophet carefully and well, and fully bore out the promise he gave some time ago. The quartets were well sung, with the assistance of Mesdames Stroud, Cubitt, and Smith, and Messrs Barber and J. H. Boardman. The singers were ably supported by a small orchestra, and Mr Lemare conducted with his usual care; Mr Boardman presiding at the organ.

THE second of Mr William Carter's present series of concerts, at the Albert Hall, took place on Monday, the 18th inst., and drew a large attendance of visitors—the cheap tariff of admission having its natural influence in producing this result. The miscellaneous public never fail to enjoy Haydn's Creation when it is set before them with reasonable efficiency; and such was the case upon the present occasion. There are few choral bodies of any numerical strength unfamiliar with this most agreeable work. Its light and easy tunefulness has long since made it the property of all amateur societies; and hence it is seldom given by associations of this class in an imperfect or unworthy manner. The large choir, presided over by Mr W. Carter, has too often been engaged in this particular performance not to have earned for itself a special credit, and to have achieved in it a reputation for bright and truthful singing, hardly to be surpassed by that of its more pretentious rival at Exeter Hall. Mr Carter's energy as a conductor is well known, and to this may be chiefly ascribed the executive proficiency which is hereby witnessed. Amendments, however, might possibly be made in the dramatic expression belonging to certain of the pieces, by a more vivid exemplification of the contrasts of which the sentiment is susceptible. As a series of musical pictures the choruses of Haydn's charming oratorio are, doubtless, among the best of their kind; but they fail in their legitimate effect if they are handled with but partial reference to their descriptive and pictorial character. Mr Carter's readings, as musical exercises, are unquestionably clear and vigorous, but are occasionally wanting in those nuances in which there is meaning as well as grace. But this, by the way. The two well-known choruses, "The heavens are telling" and "Achieved is the glorious work," could not have been better received by the audience than at this hearing. They were both delivered with suitable breadth; and, in the former case, as usual, a repetition would not have been distasteful to the majority of the listeners. The exponent of the principal soprano music was Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, who invested the two airs, "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens," with her customary charm and beauty. Singing purer in taste, or more satisfying as examples of art, could not well be imagined. Her associate in the soprano duties was a Miss Julian, but whose obvious timidity proved a stumbling-block, and delayed the good opinion that will, perhaps, by and bye await her. To Mr Edward Lloyd and Signor Foli were assigned the tenor and bass music, and as both sang carefully and steadily, the result was everything that could be wished.

PROVINCIAL.

THAMES DITTON.—A concert took place on November 19th, and was in every way highly successful. An excellent string band played several operatic pieces with effect. Miss Robinson, Miss Hester Robinson, Mr Stonard, and Mr Mathias sang some part-songs in excellent time. Mr Charles J. Bishenden, the popular bass, gained encores for his well-known singing of "The brave old oak" and "The Wolf." Great praise is due to the givers of the concert, Messrs Bailey and Smith, for their excellent arrangements.

BRIGHTON.—The Brighton Philharmonic gave a capital performance of Elijah on Saturday the 13th inst., under the direction of Mr F. Kingsbury. Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Patey, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli, were the principal vocalists, assisted by Miss Saidie Singleton, Miss Thekla Fischer, Mr G. T. Carter, and Mr H. Pyatt. Several pieces had to be repeated. The band and chorus were first rate, and Mr Willing was the organist. Mr Kuhe has given his third recital of pianoforte music, assisted by M. Paque, with whom he played Mendelssohn's Sonata for violoncello and piano, and the Misses Allitzen, two young vocalists who, it may be remembered, made a very favourable début last season in London. Unfortunately, one of the sisters, being taken unwell, was unable to get through her task, so we trust soon to have another opportunity of hearing and judging of her talent. Miss Allitzen, the contralto, sang the "Three Fishers" with such dramatic force and touching pathos—says the Brighton Gazette—that an encore was the result, when the lady sang with equal success "Many a time." This was quite a feature of the concert, and the audience appeared electrified by the feeling she threw into the two ballads. Her emphasis might have been a little too forced sometimes, but this fault escaped notice in the general effect she produced. Madame Essipoff has given a "recital," and quite won the hearts of her audience. She is truly a most charming artist. Mr Charles Halle and Madame Norman-Neruda announces a "recital" for Tuesday morning; and next Wednesday evening Mr George Watts announces the last of his present season of orchestral and choral concerts. Mr Sims Reeves is to be the "attraction," and the great tenor will be assisted by Madame Blanche Cole, Miss Singleton, Madame Patey, Mr Edward Lloyd, Signor Foli, and Mr D'Alquen. Mr Watts may safely calculate on a "full house."

Mdlle Albani is so great a favourite in Liverpool, and has won such golden opinions amongst us by her admirable singing at the festival last year and at various concerts, that her début on the local stage was anticipated with great interest, and the house, as a matter of course, was very full. Mdlle Albani's impersonation of Lucia was exquisite from first to last, elaborated with the greatest skill, and enacted with infinite delicacy and refinement—it was a complete triumph, culminating in such a realistic and touching representation of madness as once seen can scarcely be forgotten. Following so soon after Madame Nilsson's great representation of the same part, it is almost impossible to avoid comparisons, but in point of fact the two impersonations admit of no comparison. They are both distinct creations, essentially diverse yet equally great—thought out from a different point of view and each perfect in its way. The Lucia of Madame Nilsson is sublime in its tragedy, but the softer emotions are not brought into such prominence as in that of Mdlle Albani, which is all tenderness and yielding gentleness; it is indeed a most charming idealization histrionically, whilst vocally it is simply perfect—nothing more delicate, refined, and artistic can be conceived than Mdlle Albani's singing throughout the work; the brilliancy of her execution was only equalled by her exquisite phrasing, pure intonation, lovely voice, and breadth of style.—Liverpool Daily Courier.

By the St Cecilia service at St Paul's the great fact was elicited, which glows through all the clouds of failure, that an immense interest has been now established for musical celebrations of this kind. Crowds thronged to the Cathedral beyond its enormous capacity, and will no doubt do so again upon similar invitation. Forgetting, then, the mishaps of a first revival, except as lessons for the future, it may be well, even thus early, to look forward to another year; for it is only by looking well ahead that such undertakings can be properly carried out. It is not perhaps the business of the College of Organists so much as of the Cathedral authorities, to provide against a recurrence of a breakdown in the arrangements for seating band, choir, and congregation. These large musical services are happily by no means infrequent now; they have gravitated to St Paul's naturally and fitly; no one, we suppose, would now wish to discourage them. Attention ought, therefore, at once to be given to providing some special accommodation for the band and choir on such occasions; for, leaving out of sight the particular failure of St Cecilia's day, the provision for orchestral services is at no time satisfactory in the Cathedral. As we have already hinted in reporting one of these services, the construction of some kind of staging, easily moveable, and easily contractible or expansible, should be, in these days, a project not insuperable; and we can hardly imagine a more legitimate expenditure of capitular funds than such a recognition of, and provision for, our great musical church services. But leaving the engineering portion of the problem to others, some forecast of the artistic features which another celebration of St Cecilia's day should possess may not be premature. It was, perhaps, but prudent, on the occasion just past, to do nothing more than reproduce old work. But the historic traditions of the day suggest more than this; and we hope that, at a second celebration of the patron saint of church music, the art will assert its vitality by presenting some new composition of a calibre worthy to characterize the taking up of the dropped thread of St Cecilia anniversaries. Nothing is more full of life amongst us than church musical composition; and another feast of the saint around whom have been woven musical traditions should not pass without the production of an original work to mark the occasion.—Musical Standard.

EISENACH.—A performance of Schumann's Paradise und Peri was lately given by the Musical Union.

LISBON.—Un Ballo in Maschera, with Signore Sass, Rossi, Signori Augusti and Rota, has proved a great hit.

PESCIA.—A monument was inaugurated a short time since, in the Cathedral, to the memory of the composer, Pacini.

STETTIN.—Herr Theodor Hentschel's opera, Das Märchen der schönen Melusine, will shortly be produced at the Stadttheater.

BUENOS AYRES.—Verdi's Requiem has been given here by Signore Escalante, Mantilla de Lopez, Signori Vanzetti and Lombardelli. Sig. Bimboni was the conductor.

LEIPSIC.—Herr V. E. Nessler's three-act historico-romantic opera, Irmingard, has been accepted by Dr Förster, the new manager, for representation at the Stadttheater.

GENOA.—A new four-act opera, entitled Atahualpa, words by Sig. A. Ghislanzoni, music by Sig. Carlo Enrico Pasta, has just been produced here, with tolerable success.

CARE AND MIRTH.*

Care with heavy step doth jog,
Mirth doth wear a dancing shoe;
Care will stick in every bog,
Mirth will lightly foot it through.
Keep, O, Care, thy clog of woe,
I with Mirth will early go.

Care doth bear a heavy pack,
Stuff'd with sighs, and fears of pain;
But Mirth hath so straight a back,
Every load slips off again.
Keep, O Care, thy bag of woe,
I with Mirth will early go.

Care counts pebbles on the way,
Looks no higher than his knee;
But as Mirth trolls out his lay,
Flow'rs do blow, and sun shines free:
Earth-bound eyes no wisdom show;
I with Mirth will early go.

Care makes troubles quick of pace,
Crying out, while miles from Sorrow;
Mirth will hood her wrinkled face,
Passing her with light "Good morrow!"
Cross, O Care, a hand with woe,
I with Mirth will early go.

THE

OF

Four Songs

COMPOSED BY

WM STERNDALE BENNETT

(OP. 47).

*No. 1.MAIDEN MINE.
2. SUNSET.
*3.DANCING LIGHTLY.
4. STAY, MY CHARMER.

Price 4s. each.

Of this Set of Songs, the first three are not strictly posthumous works, as they were printed and quite ready for publication at the time of the composer's death. The fourth existed only in Manuscript.

* Sung by Mr SHAKESPEARE at the first Monday Popular Concert of the Season, St James's Hall, on Monday, Nov. 8, 1875.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Mr Shakespeare brought forward two unknown songs by the late Sterndale Bennett, set to some graceful stanzas from the pen of Mr T. Case. Both are the genuine products of an experienced pen, instinct with that melodious charm and refinement of detail for which even the least ambitious of their composer's works are distinguished. Musicians may give preference to the first—'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer"; but the majority of the uninitiated will, we think, find most sympathy with the second—'Maiden Mine'—as unpretending and perfect a ballad as can be imagined."—Times, 10th November, 1875.

"Two charming effusions by Sterndale Bennett, recently published under the titles, 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.' Both are destined to be favourites."—Daily Telegraph, 10th November, 1875.

"Mr Shakespeare introduced two new songs by Sir Sterndale Bennett, as delicious and elegant as anything that ever fell from his pen, the titles of which are 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.'"—Standard, 9th November, 1875.

TIETJENS IN ELIJAH.

(From the "Boston Transcript" of November 9.)

The production of Elijah by the Handel and Haydn Society on the occasion of the visit of Mdlle Tietjens, as one of the greatest living interpreters of oratorio, to this city, will be a red-letter day in the annals of our Music Hall. The great prima donna sang in the double quartet with a due sense of the native dignity of her art, and made no effort to maintain more than her position as the leading voice of the eight; and yet her voice seemed almost to equal in volume the voices of all the rest. The same gracious reserve and absence of parade characterised her performances throughout. There was never any straining for effect or any eagerness to "bring down the house," and it is evident that, had the oratorio been one to better display the leading soprano than does Elijah, there would have been only the calm and entirely self-possessed pouring out of that matchless voice, too grand to require more than the chastest decoration of art, such as has been noted in her concert performances. In the dramatic passage, between the prophet and the widow, Mdlle Tietjens' expressiveness of phrasing was most satisfyingly exhibited and quickly recognised by the audience. Another incident was the singing of the trio "Lift thine eyes," in which Tietjens, while again artistically refraining from concentrating attention on herself, made her full melodious and ringing voice bear up all the rest.

After the performance, Mdlle Tietjens was awaited on by a number of gentlemen of the society in parlour No. 3, Revere House, who presented her with a magnificent silver epergne. Mdlle Tietjens, in accepting the gift, spoke of the enjoyment she had felt at the manner in which the oratorio had been produced, and intimated her desire to sing in future concerts in Boston.

MUSIC IN CALCUTTA.

(From our Correspondent.)

Miss Alice May has become the greatest favourite ever known here. She has excellent "notices" from every paper published in Calcutta; in fact, they have almost given up criticism in her case. The Indian Statesman says:—Criticism on Miss May's performances is apt to become monotonous, for, in simple justice, it has to consist of a continuous song of praise;" and The Englishman says—"As Elvira, Miss Alice May did the fullest justice to a part which contains some very difficult passages. Her singing was thoroughly artistic, and in her execution of some of the more florid parts she was really wonderful."—Apart from the interest felt in the company, there is considerable sympathy shown, in consequence of the "Corinthian" company being unable to carry out the contract made through their agent in Melbourne and Mr Allen. It appears that this gentleman and the directors do not agree in their views of the case, and the latter, therefore, repudiate the contract. After some law, it was found unadvisable to proceed, as the company "had no funds," and, therefore, Mr Allen had to take the theatre off their hands. However, it may turn out a better speculation for the management than had the contract been carried out; but it, nevertheless, warns all who are asked to visit India to be more than sure that the parties engaging are able to carry out their contract.

October 20th, 1875.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr Hallé's last concert was in many respects interesting, though the promised appearance of Mdlle Zaré Thalberg did not take place. The young lady had taken cold in Liverpool, and Mr Gye sent Mdlle Bianchi and Mdlle Ghioti to replace her. A "Suite" by Franz Lachner was the novelty of the evening. It was generally admired, and not least by those amateurs who are jealous of any departure from the traditions of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. Sterndale Bennett's delightful "Allegro giojoso" was splendidly played by Mr Hallé and the orchestra; and, in the second part, Mr Hallé was no less successful in a Nocturne and Polonaise by Chopin.

At Mr De Jong's concert, on Saturday, Mdme Nouver and Signor Foli were the singers, and the lady and gentleman both distinguished themselves. A flute solo by De Jong was enthusiastically encored. Among the orchestral selections were the overture to Oberon and Gounod's Funeral March of a Marionette.

At the Gentlemen's Concert, on Monday last, Mdme Essipoff appeared for the first time in Manchester, and played Rubinstein's 4th Concerto and Liszt's arrangement of Weber's Polonaise. It is, of course, unnecessary to say that the fair pianist achieved an unquestionable success, and the critics are unanimous in recognising the firmness of her touch, the brilliancy of her execution; and her originality was not less admired than her artistic conscientiousness. Haydn's letter T symphony, and Cherubini's overture to Lodoïska, were also in the programme. Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington sang a new scena, Saffo, by Randegger, with rare insight and admirable vocal skill. The scena itself was quite worthy of the fine interpretation. Mr Ed. Lloyd charmed the audience by his singing of a song from Loder's "Night Dancers," and he was no less successful in Bennett's beautiful air from The Woman of Samaria, "His salvation is nigh."

Mr Carl Rosa has been gleaning fame, if not gold, by the admirable performances of his opera company. Fra Diavolo has been the most effective of them, though The Bohemian Girl, we believe, drew the largest house. As yet Mr Rosa has given us no novelty; but The Siege of Rochelle and Zampa are promised. Mr Santley has appeared in The Marriage of Figaro, The Trovatore, and Fra Diavolo. Miss Gaylord has made a most favourable impression in Fra Diavolo and The Bohemian Girl, and Mdlle Torriani and Miss Josephine Yorke are also valuable additions to the company.

St Paul will be given at Mr Hallé's concert this week. Mr Sims Reeves is engaged for the tenor music, and Mrs Osgood for the soprano solos.

Curious Geographical Fact.—Wales is at present in India.

Mr Gilbert's new fairy play will be brought out at the Court Theatre before Christmas.

Mr Henry S. Leigh is turning La Chatte Blanche into The White Cat, for the Queen's Theatre.

Mr J. P. Goldberg has been appointed a professor of singing, in the Royal Academy of Music.

The title of the new annual by the authors of The Coming K—, &c., will be Edward the Seventh.

Herr Schuberth has left town to fulfil some engagements in Holland, Germany, and Brussels, &c., &c.

Mr J. H. Cowen has left London for Binacre Hall, Suffolk, the seat of the Earl and Countess of Dudley.

Mr Sothern is expected shortly to leave England, so as to reach New York in January, to fulfil a professional engagement.

The Bristol Musical Festival of 1876 has been fixed for October 16th, and following days. Mr Charles Hallé has accepted the conductorship.

The prospectus has been issued of a new Gaiety Theatre contemplated at the west-end of Brighton, for the production of opera-bouffe, ballet, and comedy.

M. Beer, formerly a music-publisher in New York, but resident for some years in Paris, has been made an officer of the Persian Order of the Lion and the Sun.

Ferdinand Hiller proposes to give, at the Gürzenich concerts, this season, Verdi's Requiem, Carissimi's Jonah, Bach's Matthew Passion, and Handel's Alexander's Feast.

A new drama by Mr Wilkie Collins will, it is said, shortly see the light at the Royal Alexandra Theatre, Liverpool. Miss Ada Cavendish will represent the heroine.

Up to the present time, the band-masters of the Italian army have been ranked as corporals. The Minister of war has announced his intention of giving them in future the grade of officers.

An old author quaintly remarks :—"Avoid arguments with ladies. In spinning yarns among silks and satins, a man is sure to be worsted and twisted; and, when a man is worsted and twisted, he may consider himself wound up."

According to the Voss'sche Zeitung the luxurious Wahnfried Villa which R. Wagner erected at Bayreuth, to symbolise the peace (Fried') which he obtained on getting of his illusions (Wahn), is advertised for sale. The price asked is 15,000 thalers.

Balzac says that Parisian ladies have a genius for graceful walking, and seem to imprint in the fold of their robe the mould of their tiny feet. When an English or a German lady atempts this step, he states, "they have the air of a grenadier marching to attack a redoute."

M. Henri de Bornier, the successful author of the Fille de Roland, the play which is acted nearly every other night at the Théâtre Français, is a candidate for the seat left vacant in the French Academy, by M. de Rémusat's death. M. Jules Simon is also a candidate for the seat.

An engineer in Liverpool when going on board his steamer was accosted by a son of Erin's Isle, "Got all your hands engaged, sur?" "Well, no. What can you do?" "Sure, an' I can either trim or foire." "Have you ever been at sea before?" "D'ye think I came from Ireland in a cart?"

Some Milanese journals speak in enthusiastic terms of a new baritone singer, by name George Walker, Italianised into Giorgio Valcheri. They say that his voice is of extraordinary beauty, resonance, power, and compass, and that he sings and acts like an artist of the highest culture.

Investigation has shown that not only persons of great mental capacity, but also lunatics, occasionally possess brains which are considerably heavier than the average brains possessed by ordinary but sane people. Tell this to the man with a big hat when he next remarks upon the capacity of his head.

The Morgen Post, of Vienna, in their "Personal Nachrichten," says that their highly-esteemed countryman, Mr J. P. Goldberg, has just left Vienna for London, where he has been staying for a short time, on a visit to his aged mother, who had been suddenly taken seriously ill, but, we are glad to say, is now out of danger.

A new ballet entitled India; or, the Prince of Wales's visit to our Eastern Empire, is in preparation at the South London Palace of Amusement, and will shortly be produced on a scale of great magnificence.

John Bright makes the sweeping assertion that in mental power girls are not inferior to boys. There is room for discrimination here. Girls differ from boys as one star from another in glory; and it would be a mistake to say that the constellation Virgo is either inferior or superior in power to the constellation Aries.

Six busts of the finest white marble, representing the first six Roman Emperors, have been placed in the Louvre recently. They were discovered in Africa, and, although evidently many centuries old, they are as perfect as if chiselled yesterday. The modelling of the faces is said to be very fine, the profile of the Augustus especially so.

The police of San Francisco recently captured and locked up a Chinese theatre—actors, spectators and all—for violating a city ordinance which requires all places of amusement to close at 1 o'clock. The Chinese, for whose benefit the ordinance was particularly intended, disregarded it, and kept up the infernal tom-tom night after night until early morning.

Spitz, Spitze, Spider, Crab, is the title of the forthcoming pantomime at the Grecian Theatre. Mr George Conquest is to be the Crab. The famous pantomimist has, for something like eight months, turned his studies in the crab direction. He has made more than a dozen models, has passed a week in the Brighton Aquarium, and has listened to the sage counsel of Mr Frank Buckland.

We give the following exactly as we have received it :—"Sir, I have a hold dog that is worn out and I ham going to have it disstroyed but I wish to try an experiment upon it first Sir I wish to see how it wold act upon ratts when it was mad if you will oblige me by leting me know what will do it through your paper I should feel thankfull."—If the society of such an amiable owner does not drive the poor dog mad, we do not know what would.

Mdlle Tietjens has been somewhat astonished at Americans, and especially disgusted with some of the critics. A few days after her arrival, says an exchange, she wanted to go home, and begged Mr Strakosch to release her from her engagement. And with good cause; for the present critics on the New York daily press seem unusually stupid. Thus: the Times man heard her sing the "Last Rose of Summer," and criticised it as "Home, sweet home."

The programme of competitions for the Great National Welsh Eisteddfod of 1876, at Wrexham, is now completed, and the adjudicators have all been selected and published. The programme embraces Welsh and English subjects in poetry, prose, translations (Welsh English, and Latin), music (vocal, instrumental, and composition), art, science, and history, and others, for which nearly £1000 is offered in prizes. An art exhibition on a large scale is being arranged to be held in connection with the Eisteddfod.

"At a swell-wedding lately in England," observes the Chicago Tribune, "the Ladies Gwendoline and Muriel Talbot wore mob-caps. The mob-cap is a loose bag of net, edged round with a broad frill, and tied between the frill and the crown with a gray ribbon, and having a bow in front. Our girls would call the mob-cap dowdy and trying, but, on a girl with any kind of a rolling eye, it wears a saucy and piquant expression. Ladies Gwendoline and Muriel may have looked cute and sweet in them, but not all the blue blood of all the Howards and Talbots combined can resuscitate the fashion of mob-caps, except for night furniture."

"As Vesta was descending," a very fine specimen of the madrigalian school, is remarkable for the admirable counterpoint in the development of the subject introduced with the words, "Long live fair Oriana." This is taken up consecutively by second tenors, first sopranos, second sopranos, basses, first tenors, altos, when basses are heard singing the subject in notes eight times lengthened, with imitative points going on in the other parts. Further on, another effect is produced by basses giving subject four times lengthened. Thomas Weelkes, Mus. Bac., Oxon., was organist of Winchester Cathedral, and afterwards held same post at Chichester.—T. Duff Short.

Mdlle Victoria Bunsen was unanimously and deservedly recalled after Rossini's beautiful cavatina, "Oh, Patria" (Tancredi), at the last Crystal Palace Saturday Concert. The beautiful contralto voice of this young Swedish lady has greatly improved during the last year or two. She has just returned from a tour in her own country, where she has been serenaded and generally received as an artist worthy to maintain the credit already achieved by her compatriots. With the patriotism peculiar to the Swedes, Mdlle Bunsen's second contribution consisted of national melodies, when she was accompanied by her sister, Mdlle Felicia Bunsen, who is a talented and accomplished pianist.—Court Circular.

The ballads we allude to were 'I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden,' one of a set of vocal illustrations of Shelley, and 'Sweet Village Bells,' words by the late Desmond Ryan; the music in either case being of high artistic merit, and worthy the notice of the famous artist to whom the public are indebted for their acquaintance with the compositions. R. WAGNER, HIS SWAN, AND HIS LITTLE SPEECHES.

The principal event of the week has been the performance of Tannhäuser in its lengthened form. That it might fill the most capacious ear, the performance lasted something over four hours, with the co-operation of a Swan, several horses, a pack of hounds, and all the Wagnerites sojourning in Vienna. The horses and hounds behaved very becomingly; the Swan, however, behaved most unbecomingly. It took Leda under its wing and so annoyed her with its importunities, that, probably, such an exhibition for the instruction of the public in Mythology was never before witnessed in a Court Theatre. To the pure, we know, all things are pure; it is for this reason that females who sing chansonnetes and such like improper compositions, are invited to the drawing rooms of the high aristocracy, for the purpose of there pouring forth their immoral strains. But the allusions must not be too plain, and there are limits even for a Swan. Since, however, an Imperial and Royal Operahouse Swan conducts itself in so unseemly a fashion, fathers of families who think of taking their daughters to a new opera, or an old one revived, will, in future, be under the necessity of first enquiring: "Can you tell me, if you please, whether there is a Swan in the new opera?" Young ladies who were present at the last performance of Tannhäuser will, perhaps, when they next visit the Town-Park, and stroll past the pond, conceal their faces in what is termed the bosom of their Governess, as they anxiously exclaim: "Ah! Mademoiselle! a swan, a swan!" and those who have the care of the Park will, in order to spare the just susceptibilities of fair visitors, end by being compelled to furnish all the swans with trousers. Thanks to my intimate relations with the management of the Imperial Operahouse, relations which, as I scarcely ever go to see a performance and never write about one, are based upon mutual respect, I have become acquainted with the fact that the Swan which in Tannhäuser plays company to Leda is the same that in Lohengrin is harnessed to the boat of the Knight of the Holy Graal. Our expectations, however, that on taking leave of the Swan, Leda would favour us with Lohengrin's well-known song: "Nun sei bedankt, mein lieber Schwan!" were not fulfilled.

As a matter of course, the Master was called for, and we cannot help thinking that he set an example worthy of imitation by not appearing on the stage after every call, in order, according to the custom of authors, to wag his coat-tails thankfully, and, by a few capers, to express, mimically, his deep emotion at the approbation of the public, that is, of the claque. It was not till after the conclusion of the performance that the Master allowed himself to be carried away by his feelings into returning thanks from the stage. As Nature, however, has fashioned him very delicately, so that we might almost believe that, at his creation, she had in her mind the proportions of the Bayreuth Theatre rather than those of a theatre in a large capital; as his appearance might not have been observed; and as, furthermore, it would have clashed with theatrical tradition for his wife to have taken him up in her arms for the purpose of showing him to the assembled multitude, he was obliged to make a short speech, in order that, if not seen, he might, at least, be heard.

But Herr Wagner is as unfortunate in his speeches as the Pope in his telegraphic blessings, or the late low comedian, Scholz, with the new pieces he selected for his benefit, or our own Stuwer with his fireworks, or Ernst Eckstein, the literary old-clothesman, with his stories. Whenever the Pope has blessed a sick person by telegraph, he has always been unfortunate enough to have the telegraphee die forthwith; when Scholz chose a piece for his benefit, he had the misfortune of always seeing it prove a failure; when Stuwer announced a display of fireworks, he had the misfortune of being favoured with rain which gradually developed into a general and copious downpour; when Ernst Eckstein throws a new story on the market, he has regularly the misfortune of finding the purport of his story related much better in an old Meidinger anecdote; and, when Richard Wagner makes a speech in public, he has the misfortune of always deeply insulting some one or other. Thus, on the present occasion, he insulted the ladies and gentlemen who sang in his opera, when he assured the public of his readiness to enchant them with his other operas, "so far as the existing means of execution would permit."

When any one has sung himself hoarse for four hours, and expects that, at the conclusion of the performance, the thankful composer, a prey to emotion, will hand him a packet of sweetmeats, it must certainly be very painful to be treated to a box on the ear in the shape of the assertion that he is a miserable duffer. However, although the maestro is not on principle averse to indulging in such playful surprises, we believe that on this occasion he was misunderstood. When, in an opera, six horses, nine hounds, and a swan, are employed besides the singers, the latter cannot be so brazen-faced as to assert that the charge of insufficiency is to be understood as applying to them alone. It is possible that Herr Wagner may contemplate shortly introducing in one of his operas from the Sagas of the Northern Divinities fifteen tame Polar bears, and that he is tortured by melancholy apprehension lest the resources of Vienna in bears may not be equal to the performance of the opera.

In a speech to the offended artists, however, Herr Wagner endeavoured to calm their excitement. Of course, in so doing he had the misfortune deeply to insult some one else. Fortunately, on this occasion, it was only the journalists who were the sufferers, and an insult offered to them may always calculate on meeting with thankful ears in the artistic world. In his speech to the singers, Herr Wagner exclaimed: "I hate the newspapers, because they endeavoured to render my efforts ridiculous; I never read a newspaper!" If the maestro had declared: "I hate journalists, because they endeavoured to render me ridiculous!" every one would find such a course intelligible; every great man does not possess the calm soul of Socrates, who, when Aristophanes tried, in The Clouds, to turn him into ridicule, rose laughingly from his seat, so that the public might the better compare the original with the caricature. But that, because, some one has now and then in a newspaper laughed at the composer's exaggerations, Herr Wagner should resolve to know nothing of the insurrection in the Herzogovina, or of the Sonzogno trial, or of Prince Bismarck's speeches, or, in short, of the other interesting topics contained in a newspaper, strikes us as, in the highest degree, comic.* On calm reflection, he will be compelled to admit that it was he himself who on several occasions provoked the humour, and if, because people often find the comical points in his character comic, he no longer reads a newspaper, it is just as if a man, because his companion in a railway carriage once made a joke on his long nose, should resolve never to travel again by rail. Yet it is not so easy to break one's self of a long nose as of other objectionable things.

The maestro's susceptibility is the more striking as he is fond of giving the reins to his own comic vein, and has repeatedly endeavoured to cast ridicule on the efforts of others. Let anyone only read his jokes on the composer of Les Huguenots, and other eminent men. It is true that Meyerbeer cannot avenge himself and declare in a public speech: "I hate Richard Wagner for attempting to render my operas ridiculous, and I no more read his writings than I listen to his operas," because Meyerbeer is dead. And this is an advantage always enjoyed by the satirist who makes the Dead ridiculous, over him who lashes the weaknesses of the Living.—Neue Freie Presse.

MADRID.—Signora Fossa and Signor Stagno, as Selika and Vasco di Gama, respectively, have made a very favourable impression at the Italian Opera.

PESTH.—The Abbate Franz Liszt is expected here about the middle of January. He is at present busily engaged, at Rome, in completing an oratorio.

* Considering, however, that Jupiter Wagner really reads, in his earthly residence at the Hôtel Impérial, all the papers of Vienna, he will have been able to see that on this occasion the leading critics have been unanimous in praising the admirable manner in which Tannhäuser has been put upon the stage. His hate, as unjust as fiery, will, therefore, in no way affect us. This laughable language about newspapers is held by every one, from individuals of the very highest rank down to the most insignificant nobody who has to appear in a public capacity. There is not a single ambitious, vain man who will admit he reads the papers; and yet every such being suffers from insupportable nervousness if the paper is accidentally wanting. This is an old story, which will remain new as long as the little Gods of Earth are untruthful to themselves, and badly behaved children break the looking-glass because it does its duty, and faithfully mirrors the reality.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Going steadily and in masterly style through the Beethoven series, Mr Manns presented last Saturday the fourth symphony, which was executed it is needless to say how perfectly. The next most important instrumental work was Gounod's overture to La Nonne Sanglante—interesting and graceful, like everything Gounod has written, and very dramatic—one may even say melodramatic—in character. Having but little faith in the descriptive power of music, and being quite unable to understand a story told in music, unless previously instructed through the medium of ordinary language as to its drift—never, moreover, having read The Bleeding Nun—we cannot tell whether the overture to La Nonne Sanglante is dramatic in the highest sense of the word; but it is full of contrasts, and it suggests mystery. It conveys hints too of the supernatural world or—what comes to the same thing—of the incantation music in—Robert le Diable. Whether "the bleeding nun" was brought again to life like the full-blooded and fascinating nuns who were resuscitated by Robert, M. Gounod's elegant music does not clearly make known. But, like all music worth hearing, the overture to La Nonne Sanglante is self-sufficing and interesting for its own sake. It would form an equally appropriate introduction to the Castle of Otranto or the Mysteries of Udolfo. Of course, there are passages in it which remind one of Faust, as, indeed, there are in everything M. Gounod has written.

The solo instrumentalist of the day was Mr Holmes, who played the violin part in a concerto of his own. All eminent violinists seem to have been composers; and the early violinists, the Viottis and Corellis, are known in the present day not merely by their historical reputation, but by their written works. Continuing in some measure the ancient and respectable tradition, Tartini, Paganini, Ernst, Vieuxtemps, Sivori, Joachim, Wilhelmj, and Holmes have each and all written for their own particular instrument; and it would be impossible to disguise the fact that most of these distinguished artists have produced works unworthy of their talent as executants. Madame Norman-Néruda is the only violinist of high merit we can call to mind who has never written the smallest "elegy" or "romance"—not to speak of those sonatas and even concertos in which the more daring spirits indulge. For that reason we shall always honour Madame Norman-Néruda. Alone among violinists she has composed nothing for the violin; which does not prevent her from playing every piece of violin music she undertakes with as much feeling as though she herself had produced it. As for Mr Holmes, he proclaims himself to every one who hears him a brilliant performer. He is a musician, too, in every sense of the word. Perhaps, for that reason, his works are more likely to be appreciated by musicians than by the general public. The worst of violinists' music is that it contains such an abundance of passages for the violin. Thus what is called a concerto often turns out to be little more than a long series of exercises more or less skilfully put together, and furnished with an orchestral accompaniment. This remark is not intended to apply specially to Mr Holmes' composition, in which the orchestra is often very effectively handled where the solo instrument is silent. Many composers, less studious and less able than Mr Holmes, have written more agreeable music. But England does not possess so many composers that she can afford to dispense with the labours of the brothers Holmes; and it must be admitted that the violin concerto of the one brother, like the recently produced cantata (Jeanne d'Arc) of the other, found plenty of admirers at the Crystal Palace.

The vocal music at this concert was contributed by Madlle Ida Corani, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli. Madlle Corani is a débutante, so far as England is concerned, and she sang on Saturday for the first time in this country. In spite of her youth, she has filled leading parts for at least one season at the principal Italian theatres; and, if she were to appear next summer at either of our Operahouses as Amina, Lucia, Linda, or, above all, as Gilda in Rigoletto, she might reckon beforehand on the most complete success. The music of Oscar in Un Ballo in Maschera would also be perfectly suited to her clear transparent voice of the purest soprano type and to her equally brilliant and sympathetic style. On the occasion of her first appearance before a London public (Sydenham is, we believe, included by our statisticians within the limits of what is called "Greater London"), Mdlle Ida Corani sang the cavatina of La Sonnambula, in which her expressive delivery of the slow movement at once gained for her the favour of the audience. In the concluding movement the young artist displayed remarkable facility of execution. Indeed, only a consummate vocalist can sing this familiar but always beautiful air from beginning to end as it should be sung, and as it was sung on Saturday by Mdlle Ida Corani. The new singer was afterwards heard in two well-chosen lieder — one by Taubert, the other by Brahms—both of which she delivered with good enunciation in English. Taubert's little song, for beauty and finish, may well be called a "gem"—and a gem perfectly set. There is much pathos, too, in the simple ballad (a species of lullaby) by Brahms, of which the second verse, sung throughout mezza voce, has a charming effect. Such compositions as these are better fitted for the concert room than any kind of operatic air; and so perfect was Mdlle Corani's mezza voce in Brahm's cradle song, that she was called upon to repeat both verses.

It seldom happens that at a high-class instrumental concert, such as those of the Crystal Palace, vocal music is so well represented as it was at the concert of Saturday. The tenor, Mr Edward Lloyd, was worthy of the admirable soprano, and the bass, Signor Foli, worthy of both. The former distinguished himself by his excellent singing of the beautiful tenor solo in Bennett's May Queen (we should have been glad to hear the entire work, with Mdlle. Ida Corani, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli in the principal parts), the latter was heard to great advantage in the air for Eleazar in La Juive.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The rival Italian Opera performances came to an end on Saturday evening. The Queen's Theatre was crowded to excess every time Mdme Nilsson played; and your readers only require to be told that she sang in Faust, Il Trovatore, and Les Huguenots, to understand the effect she produced. One of the great sensations of the week was Madlle Albani's Elsa in Lohengrin. Of the performance of this opera generally I will only say that it was at least better than we expected; but with Madlle Albani's singing and acting as the heroine every one was more than charmed. I hear but one opinion about it. Madlle Varesi won universal praise as Lucia, Gilda, the Queen in Les Huguenots, and as Donna Elvira in Don Giovanni, at the Queen's Theatre, where Mdme Trebelli sang in nearly every opera—how, it is perfectly unnecessary to say. Herr Behrens has made very great progress, and his Marcel and Leporello were both admired. I ought not to forget Signor Brignoli, who sang magnificently in Don Giovanni; and perhaps never, since his return from America, did this fine singer produce greater effect than by his thoroughly artistic delivery of "Il mio tesoro," which narrowly escaped the honour of a double encore. At the Prince's Theatre, where Mr. Gye's company played Lohengrin, MadlleZaré Thalberg appeared twice with unquestionable success, once as Zerlina, and once as Dinorah, in which this exceedingly clever and highly gifted young lady acts with far more animation than in Don Giovanni. One of the most agreeable performances of the week was that of the Figlia del Regimento, at this theatre, in which Mdlle Bianchi had a success, of the kind, I believe, it is the fashion to call "enormous." M. Maurel greatly pleased our local amateurs, but M. Naudin was not in sufficiently good voice to do justice to himself.

Mr Hallé's concert, last week, was very pleasant, and the band gave one of the finest performances of the Scotch Symphony ever heard in Manchester. Mr Hallé, himself, played Beethoven's C minor concerto with unfailing insight and irrepressible execution. Mdlle Bianchi and Signor Medini were the only singers. Last night there was a concert of classical chamber music, at the concert-hall. I am sure I need do no more than give you the names of the executants—Madame Norman-Néruda, Messrs Hallé, Straus, and Vieuxtemps:—

Trio—violin, viola, and violoncello, Serenade in D (Beethoven); Glees, "Thy voice, O harmony" (Webbe), and "Blow, blow, thou winter wind" (Stevens); Duet—pianoforte and violin, Sonata in A, No 17 (Mozart); Part-song, "Come, Dorothy, come" (Swabian volkslied); Solo violin, Sonata in D (Corelli); Glee, "Ye spotted snakes" (Stevens); Quartet—pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, in E flat (Rheinberger).

The Messiah will be given, in the Free Trade Hall, this week, on Thursday and Friday, conducted by Mr Hallé, with Mdmes Sherrington and Patey, Mr Cummings and Signor Foli as principal singers; and, on Saturday (conducted by Mr De Jong), with Mdme Blanche Cole, Miss D'Alton, Mr Barton McGuckin, and Signor Foli as the soloists.

MUSIC AT ETON.

(From "Concordia.")

Eton College has just come before the public in a manner not altogether suggestive of the peace and harmony which should reign within such classic precincts. It does this now and then. Needs must that an institution with which the welfare of many persons is bound up should become the scene of occasional jarrings and strife, and as the College occupies a quasi-public position, the temptation is to wash its dirty linen full in the eyes of the world. With this, however, we have nothing to do. Mr Browning's relations to Dr Hornby are no concern of ours, and we only refer to the matter for the sake of contrast. Yonder are the Eton masters squabbling among themselves, writing to the papers, signing "round robins" and what not besides. That is one picture. The other is presented by Eton College in the act of submitting to a new law which practically makes the study of music an obligation upon its pupils. Every boy in the Fourth Form, according to Dr Hornby's vigorous edict, must go through a course of musical study; and, as nearly all reach that moderate eminence, it follows that only an insignificant minority, if any, will quit Eton without learning something of the art. Even if we look at the advance thus made with reference to Eton alone, we cannot fail to recognise it as a subject for congratulation—auspicium melioris ævi. This is no ordinary school which adds music to its necessary studies, and these are no ordinary boys who are required to submit to the regulation. Of course we do not mean that the capacity for excellence in music or anything else is found to a greater extent beneath the shadow of Windsor Castle than at Harrow or Rugby, or, indeed, at any elementary school. The accidents of life confer rank and wealth upon a limited class, but the higher gifts of mind and soul are bestowed by nature with an impartial hand. More than this, it must be held, as Mr Gladstone holds, that genius in art is oftener a possession of the humble and poor than of the rich and great. We shall not be mistaken, therefore, when we refer to the distinctive position held by Eton College and those who are educated within its walls. Nobody expects any amount of musical teaching there given to produce composers and artists, but it may do service quite as useful. We will endeavour to show how.

In the first place, the absolute recognition of music at Eton will impress a sense of its importance upon an influential class of society. For years past the art has had a kind of half-footing within the school, being treated with a contemptuous tolerance more harmful than absolute exclusion. The boys who chose to learn it were permitted to do so after a fashion; and those who did not were equally free to let it alone. Music, in point of fact, occupied a lower position, regarded as a branch of training, than the various forms of physical exercise which our "golden youth" have lifted to the rank of a muscular religion. A boy who held aloof from the playing fields and the river—if any did so—was regarded as an infidel. He who shunned the music-class did a thing so common that the fact was never noticed. The influence of this upon the pupils scarcely needs to be pointed out. An art appeared of little value which the rules allowed them to neglect, and the idea thus formed was conceived at the most impressionable age by young men destined, for the most part, to occupy places of influence in society. Instead of being a centre of "sweetness and light," Eton, as regards music, was rather a hot-bed for the propagation of Philistinism. It countenanced and sustained a form of snobbery prominently represented by the letter-writing Earl of Chesterfield, whose son was, very likely, an Etonian, and who himself is the type of an order by no means extinct. Music, certainly, was to him, as it still is to not a few patricians and their imitators, a thing of value enough to render tolerable the existence of necessarily low people its professors, whose pursuits, however, no gentleman could join in without losing caste. "Let the fiddle alone," counselled the Earl, "it is all very well for fiddlers, but you, my son, are," &c., &c. Doubtless this stupid prejudice has long been waning—a fact which hardly needed the apparition of a Royal Prince fiddling on a public orchestra to demonstrate. But contemptuous tolerance of music still exists among the jeunesse dorée to a greater extent than is, perhaps, allowed to appear, and this is why the new Eton law assumes an importance stretching beyond its direct action. Upon its immediate results we will not insist, though a professor like Mr Barnby inspires confidence in the thoroughness of the teaching, and the earnestness which will pervade the music-room. What seems to us of more value is the fact that henceforth the art stands before the eyes of Eton youth clothed with the dignity of a recognised branch of study, and essential to the training of a gentleman.

It is a pity that the musical reform at our greatest public school has come so late in the day. Interdum vulgus rectum videt. The study of music at Eton is made an essential after its importance has long been recognised in the education of the poorer classes. One of the earliest acts of the School Board for London was to appoint an Inspector whose business it is to stimulate and direct the energies of the teachers in the matter of musical training; and we know as a fact that, with regard to the "divine art," most of our boasted public schools are behind many of those called into existence by Mr Forster and the "wisdom of Parliament." A contrast so humiliating will not long affect Eton. Mr Barnby has now all the liberty of action he can desire, and, unless we are greatly deceived in him, he will soon make musical education at that illustrious school a real thing. When Eton leads, other institutions of a like character must follow, and the probability is that a wave of zeal on behalf of music will now sweep over the England of education. It is time. Too long have we given ourselves up to what are called "material interests," running after wealth and position, as though such things were the end and aim of life, to the neglect of that gentle culture which makes of faculties common to all a source of undying pleasure, and lifts us to the true dignity of manhood—a dignity which the peasant may, in his degree, share with the prince. Every step that nears a change for the better in this respect is one to be received with a hearty welcome; wherefore we congratulate Eton upon taking its place as a school of music, and wish it in that capacity "long continuance and increasing."

FRAULEIN ANNA MEHLIG'S RECITAL.

One of the most enjoyable concerts of this season, was the one which Fräulein Anna Mehlig gave on Thursday, 9th inst., at St James's Hall, with the assistance of Mdme Annette Essipoff, Fräulein Sophie Löwe, and Herr Wilhelmj. The concert commenced with Bach's Praeludium and Fugue in G minor, finely executed by the fair artist, who was subsequently heard in Weber's Sonata in A flat, which she played with a delightful appreciation of its beauties. The softness and delicacy of her pianissimo passages, in the last movement of this beautiful sonata, were particularly admired. Mdlle Mehlig's other solos were a Nocturne by Chopin, and one of the "Soirées de Vienne," arranged by Liszt, both of which were capitally played. A most charming performance was that of Schubert's Rondo in B minor, for pianoforte and violin, by Mdlle Mehlig and Herr Wilhelmj. It was given with a dash and vigour that could scarcely be surpassed. The admirable qualities of Herr Wilhelmj's playing were so much appreciated that, after his performance of the Romance from Chopin's Concerto in E, he was "recalled," when he gave one of his own composition. Among the most interesting items in the programme were the joint performances of Mdme Annette Essipoff and Fräulein Mehlig, in Herr Reinecke's "Impromptu" for two pianofortes, on a theme from Schumann's Manfred—played in such a manner that the listeners might have fancied Thorwaldsen's "Graces" had associated themselves with Anderssen's "Fairies"—and Schumann's "Andante con variazione," also for two pianofortes, both performances being perfect. The performers did not gratify the desire of the audience, who wished to hear both pieces over again—a desire that was also expressed after each of Mdlle Mehlig's solo performances. The vocalist was Fräulein Sophie Löwe, a daughter of Herr Feodor Löwe, one of the most renowned German actors. Fräulein Löwe gave Brahm's "Ruhe Süssliebchen" and "Sonntag," and Nos. 1 and 2 of Schumann's "Frauenliebe und Leben," accompanied by Sir Julius Benedict, and was called upon to repeat Brahm's "Sonntag."

Before concluding my report of this delightful concert, I think it my duty to acknowledge the graceful kindness Mdme Essipoff showed to her colleague, by giving her valuable assistance to a concert which their joint efforts rendered so successful. Such a sign of congeniality between great performers on the same instrument is most agreeable to record. SIGMUND MENKES.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

The favourable reception accorded some time ago to the revival of Esther fully justified the second performance given on Saturday. The production of Handel's first English oratorio confers high credit on those who superintend the management of the Saturday Concerts now held week after week in the lesser music-hall of this vast and splendid building. Special acknowledgments are due to Mr H. Weist Hill, responsible adviser in all the arrangements connected with this particular department. To more competent hands such an office could hardly have been intrusted. Mr Hill is not merely a well-informed musician, but an excellent conductor, as has already been proved, both in his direction of choral and orchestral works. He has under control an orchestra strong alike in numbers and efficiency, and he uses the "bâton" with the ease and surety of an experienced practitioner. His chorus, too, which may take just pride in the title of the "Alexandra Palace Chorus," is evidently trained to answer all purposes. Each has been fairly tested in a work which, though exhibiting all the characteristic mannerisms of Handel, may be regarded as something comparatively new. To earnest students of Handel, and to amateurs of his Biblical lyric dramas, to which in so many instances the now somewhat vague term "oratorio" is applied, the pieces that make up Esther—not alone its frequently played overture, but its other numbers—are more or less familiar. True, the original autograph manuscript has been hidden, like a half-buried classic, in a library not usually open to general inspection; but the printed editions, from those of Walsh and Arnold down to those of Lucas and Chrysander, varying as they materially do, have been at the ready command of all those who choose to seek them out. Many other oratorios, from the same exhaustless pen, have, time out of mind, lain on the shelf, only to be consulted by eager votaries; and Esther has suffered no worse neglect than some of these, which—instance Balthazar, Deborah (performed the other night at Exeter Hall by the Sacred Harmonic Society), &c.—are of equal, if not superior, power. It was a happy thought, nevertheless, on the part of the Alexandra Palace Directors, as musical archæologists, to revive the work; and it is not at all unlikely that we shall hear more of it, inasmuch as it offers not a few occasions for the "solo" vocalists to show their capabilities. True, that the choral portions have, for the most part, a far higher significance; but it will be generally admitted that a considerable majority, however imposing they may find the choruses, entertain a sly predilection for the songs, duets, &c.—in oratorio as well as in opera; and, after all, if this were not the case, what would become of our famous sopranos, tenors, contraltos, baritones, and basses?

The second performance of Esther at the Alexandra Palace—in spite of some disappointments—was manifestly superior to the first. The execution of many of the choruses being remarkable for precision. We may single out from the rest "Ye sons of Israel mourn," one of those pathetic outbursts in which Handel has scarcely known a rival, and which, but that it comes again after the air "O Jordan, sacred tide!" (admirably sung by Madlle Enriquez), would have certainly been repeated, in obedience to the unanimously expressed desire of those among the audience unaware that it forms the sequel and brings the first part of the oratorio to an end. "Virtue, truth, and innocence," the peroration to Part II., the "Invocation," "He comes to end our woes," at the beginning of Part III., and "The Lord our enemy has slain," which, notwithstanding a certain diffuseness, attributable to the episodical interruptions of the solo voices, is conceived and developed in Handel's most impressive and magnificent style, were also among the choral displays most worthy recognition. The orchestra throughout left little or nothing to desire. The "additional accompaniments" to the original score, supplied by Mr J. Halberstadt, are for the greater part unobtrusive and judicious. The "disappointments" to which reference has been made were the absence of Mr Vernon Rigby and Mdme Blanche Cole, who were respectively set down for the principal tenor and soprano parts. But the young and rising artist, Mr William Shakespeare, was an excellent substitute for the former, and Mdme Nouver, with real ability, took the place of the latter. The melodious duet, "Who calls my parting soul," was so well given that a repetition was asked for too emphatically to be declined. The other parts were assigned to Messrs Howells and Wadmore—the latter a baritone from our Royal Academy of Music, and one of the "prize-winners" at the National Music Meetings instituted by Mr Willert Beale at the Crystal Palace. Both obtained well deserved recognition.—Times, Dec. 6.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

When my visits to the metropolis of the midlands were confined to a period of once in three years, and taking up my abode at the "Queen's," I beheld the success, artistic and pecuniary, of the great and justly celebrated triennial festivals, in common with many others I was under the impression that Birmingham was a really musical town, musical in the highest acceptation of the term. Some years of residence, and a literally regular attendance at its concerts have, however, served to dispel that fond illusion, and I have gradually and surely (if reluctantly) arrived at the conclusion that the Birmingham public does not care for music in its best sense. If argument or illustration be wanted to prove this assertion, could anything more striking be adduced than the fact that the Festival Choral Society, established as far back as 1845, and which has rendered such eminent service, and contributed so largely to the musical results of the Festivals, fails to command more than a scanty audience but half filling the Town Hall, and is year after year a financial failure. Take their second concert for instance. If there are any two names illustrious in the divine art, and which should attract above all a Birmingham public, for whom such masterpieces as Elijah and The Woman of Samaria were expressly written, it should surely be Mendelssohn and Sterndale Bennett; and yet when the Loreley of the one, and the May Queen of the other are announced with thoroughly capable artists, and the super-added inducement of a new cantata by a clever and rising townsman, what does one see? The great gallery nearly empty, the side galleries sparsely filled, and the floor a "world too wide" for its few occupants. Whether, under these adverse and discouraging circumstances, the society will much longer continue its struggling existence is an open question. Nor is it the Festival Choral Society alone that has suffered by the indifference of Birmingham to music of the higher order. Messrs Harrisons and Messrs Adams and Beresford could tell a tale of how, season after season, they had given chamber concerts with artists of recognized position, such as Mdme Norman-Neruda, Charles Hallé, &c., and failed to clear their expenses; while, in former years, Messrs Flavell and others made equally futile attempts to improve public taste. The complaint, therefore, is one of old standing, and, judging by present symptoms, one not very likely to be speedily cured.

In the May Queen the solo parts were sustained by Miss Jessie Jones, a soprano with a pleasing, if not powerful, voice; Miss Dones, a contralto of some promise; Mr Edward Lloyd, who has fairly and honourably earned the position he holds as one of the best of English tenors; and Mr Hilton, a painstaking bass; one and all exerting their powers, with credit to themselves and satisfaction to their hearers, in the ever charming and delightful pastoral of our greatest English composer; while in Mendelssohn's fragment of his, alas! unfinished opera, Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington worthily sustained her well-won reputation. Mr Anderton has chosen for his cantata a subject peculiarly amenable to musical treatment, the familiar poem of Cowper, John Gilpin; and, entering thoroughly into the spirit of the words, has produced a work well worthy the notice of choral societies in particular, and the approbation of the public in general. Tuneful and flowing, humorous without the least suspicion of vulgarity, light without being frivolous, and solid without being heavy; the instrumental parts illustrative, yet properly subordinated to the vocal; the whole work has, to use an expressive term, a "go" about it rarely met with; and the thoroughly hearty and unanimous call for the composer was as genuine as it was well deserved, and not, as is too frequently the case, a mere idle compliment, but bespoke something more than a bare succès d'estime.

Digitized by Google

Of the twelve numbers which make up the cantata three were encored; the chorus "John Gilpin kissed his loving wife," quartet "The Dogs did bark," and the soprano air (given with considerable archness by Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington), "At Edmonton his loving wife." In addition to the lady named, Miss Dones, and Messrs Lloyd and Hilton contributed their share as soloists, while band and chorus rendered their parts con amore, Mr Stockley conducting with his accustomed care and skill.

The society will give its usual Christmas performance of the Messiah on the 27th inst., with Mdme Blanche Cole, Mdme Patey, Messrs Vernon Rigby and Whitney as principals, Mr T. Harper being engaged for the solo trumpet. D. H.

TANNHAUSERIANA IN VIENNA.

On the evening of the 20th November the general rehearsal of Tannhäuser took place at the Imperial Operahouse; the first performance was announced for the 22nd; between the two came a performance of Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, "Eingekeilt in drangvoll fürchterliche Enge" ("Indriven like a wedge with fearful closeness,") we might almost exclaim with Schiller. The general rehearsal was gone through in the presence of a number of visitors, most of whom had been invited by the composer. As is the case previous to all grand Wagner displays, there was no want of little conflicts behind the scenes. These conflicts actually rendered it dubious whether the rehearsal would be held at all. As, however, everything was at last amicably arranged, it is not now worth while speaking of the "Minstrel's War upon the Wartburg" before it was represented to the public.

On the 22nd ult., then, the performance, which had been magnified into a grand event, really took place. As the bills announced, the old opera was given "according to the new version, and with new scenery." It lasted from half-past six to nearly half-past ten, but a portion of the audience found it too long, and left before the end. After the earlier acts, Wagner, despite loud calls, did not appear upon the stage, but merely bowed from the box which he occupied on the pit tier with his wife and Madame von Dönhoff. At the termination of the opera, however, he appeared upon the stage with the principal artists, Ehnn, Materna, Labatt, Bignio, and Scaria, and thanked the audience in the following short address: "Next May it will be about fifteen years since I first heard my Lohengrin; it was played before you, or at least before many of you. You then awarded my efforts a friendly reception, and it seems as if something similar were being repeated to-day, when I am endeavouring, as far as the existing means of execution permit" (!!), "to render my works still more plain to you. I return you my cordial thanks for your encouragement." After this speech, a gigantic laurel-wreath fell at Wagner's feet, while the artists began to fret and fume. After all the sacrifices they had made, they received, in the words, "as far as the existing means of execution permit," the moral box on the ear which the master never fails to administer in every transaction wherein he is personally engaged. Concerning the mode in which this storm in a tea-cup was with difficulty appeased, by Wagner's giving a complimentary explanation, with which he combined another box on the ear (the second being death to the newspapers), we refrain from writing anything more, so as not to fall into the domain of scandal. We will merely reproduce from the Wiener Fremdenblatt that part of Speidl's notice which relates directly to the performance itself. This is what the writer says:—

"If we are asked whether Wagner's new version, on the one hand, and the restoration of the original score, on the other, are improvements, we must, as far as concerns the work as a whole, answer with a decided: 'No!' The new scenes in the Venus-Grot are based upon the Paris score, but the composer has freely remodelled them. While, in the Paris version, the overture is played to the end, and the first scene commences independently, the Vienna score—for so we may henceforth designate the new version—breaks off the overture in the middle, or rather, as the curtain goes up, takes it uninterruptedly into the scene of the Venusberg, and allows it to discharge itself into the ballet-music. The ballet, which Wagner arranged expressly to satisfy a want felt in Paris, doing so, too, against his own better feeling, is, to our mind, not only superfluous, but utterly the reverse of pleasing. The idea of the entire opera, the passionate struggle between Heathendom and Christendom, between sensual delight and peace of soul, is here to be symbolised by so many legs. Drunken Satyrs, full of lust, rush upon dancing Nymphs and thyrsus-waving Mænads, for the purpose of bending them to their own will; the mild presence of the three Graces, however, appears intended to exercise a pacificatory influence, while Christian angels contend in the air with bow-armed Cupids. All this is accompanied by the howling and screeching of an unheard of kind of music, inexhaustible in cutting dissonances, as well as, at the same time, of the coarsest and most far-fetched sensuality. We hear the buzzing of the Spanish flies, while the beverage retailed by the Satyrs is schnaps flavoured with cayenne pepper. It will be difficult even for Richard Wagner to reproduce such a fearful and filthy musical mess. The situation is, as regards music, thoroughly exhausted and thoroughly exhausting, in strict keeping with Wagner's latest transcendentalism. There is scarcely anything which does not bring Venus before us. Wagner himself perceived that, with such a deluge of animal feeling, he needed some more than usually firm support, and so he makes Tannhäuser sing his hymn three times (instead of only twice as formerly). By this over-manipulation, Wagner has completely destroyed the homogeneous style of his opera, and blindly sinned against his youthful work, the scattered beauties of which we need not again enumerate here. On the other hand, by ignoring cuts which had become traditional, and which were thoroughly justified, he has proved almost demonstratively the connection between his own creation and the old style of opera. We find—and all such reminiscences cling to a conductor who is much employed—traces of Spontini, Donizetti, Lortzing, nay, even—O, what deep degradation!—of Mozart. Greatly to their disadvantage, the duet and finale of the second act are given unabridged, while Elizabeth's prayer in its extended form, as at present restored, gives us the foretaste of an eternal, if not a blessed, life. Wagner has consented to one omission; in the Contest of the Minstrels he has closed Walther's lips, and this silence is golden. The new version of Tannhäuser tends essentially to spoil the work, and, in the interest of good taste, as well as of human acoustic capabilities, it will be necessary, sooner or later, to return to the old arrangement."

The restored Tannhäuser reached in safety two performances. The third, fixed for the 20th November, did not come off. The reason assigned was that Herr Lebatt, the hero of the piece, had fallen ill for an indefinite period. Such a thing may very well happen, and, at any rate, is preferable to the lot of Schnorr von Carolsfeld. It accidentally, however, came to pass that A. Fürstner, the Berlin publisher of the additions to the opera, had resolved to appeal to the law-courts for an injunction to prevent the performance of the 30th, since, according to his agreement, he believes he has some claims to a percentage on the receipts, claims which Wagner disputes. The delay still continues, and people ask whether the obstacle is Herr Labatt or Herr Fürstner. What a plebeian freak of Destiny! To think that an Imperial Court Theatre can be affected by such influences!

The first two performances were, it must be confessed, brilliantly distinguished by rare precision and correctness of execution, as well as by extraordinary scenic effects. Wagner's personal co-operation had been exerted for the benefit not only of musicians and singers, but, also, for that of supernumeraries, members of the ballet, machinists, and scene-painter, so that everything as "far as the existing means of execution permit," went like clock-work. What a pity these winged words ever escaped from between the barriers of the composer's teeth! They have been everywhere attacked. Though the artists to whom they were applied are apparently appeased, this is not the case with other persons. Reference is made to them in every notice and in every letter published by the Press.—Berlin Echo.

DÜSSELDORF.—The fine new Stadtheater was recently opened. The proceedings commenced with a spirited overture by Herr Skraup; then came a clever prologue, written by Herr Emil Rittershaus, and spoken by the manager, Herr Scherbarth. This was followed by Beethoven's Coriolan Overture, which introduced Goethe's Götz von Berlichingen. The first opera performed in the new house was Beethoven's Fidelio.

DESSAU.—Herr Hermann Götz's opera, Die bezähmte Widerspenstige, will be produced here almost immediately. The composer, a native of Königsberg, resides at Hottingen, near Zurich. He is engaged on another opera, entitled Francesca di Rimini, which will be completed this year, and first brought out in Vienna. Herr Götz has for a long time been a great sufferer. His lungs are affected, and he dares scarcely speak.

(By permission of Pluto, Esq.)

DR SERPENT.—"Madame Tussaud!"—Eh?

DR GHOST. "Automaton!"—Eh?

DR SERPENT.—Why, then, Bülow is a bycicle?

DR GHOST.—No!—a meteor. Let's hear the sonata; Essipoff, the Enchantress, is going to play.

Wraith of Dussek.

WRAITH OF DUSSEK (sepulchrally).—Arthur Chappell—where's my "Plus Ultra"?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST.—Alas! poor Wraith!—as Joseph Bennett says.

WRAITH OF DUSSEK.—Where's my "Invocation?"

DRS SERPENT and GHOST.—Poor Wraith! Nowhere!

(Wraith of Dussek vaporates.)

Digitized by Google

Wraith of Woelfl.

WRAITH OF WOELFL.—Where's my "Ne Plus Ultra"? (bother Dussek, with his "Plus"). Where my "C minor"?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST (in a scarcely audible tone).—Alas! poor Wraith!—as Joseph Bennett says. (Wraith of Woelfl vaporates.)

Wraith of Hummel.

WRAITH OF HUMMEL.—Where's my "106"?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST (with voices carefully subdued).—Poor Wraith!—He thinks his "106" equal to Beethoven's!

WRAITH OF HUMMEL.—Arabella played it.

DR SERPENT (maliciously).—Yes, but no one else.

WRAITH OF HUMMEL.—Mine is in D.

DR GHOST.—And Beethoven's in B flat. There's the difference.

(Wraith of Hummel vaporates.)

Wraith of Moscheles.

WRAITH OF MOSCHELES.—Where's my Beethoven sonata?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST.—That's in E.

WRAITH OF MOSCHELES.—And my Sonate Melancolique?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST.—That's in F sharp minor.

(Wraith of Moscheles vaporates.)

Wraith of Pinto.

WRAITH OF PINTO.—Where are my sonatas?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST.—Nowhere. They wont have 'em in Yankee-land.

(Wraith of Pinto vaporates.)

Wraith of Mozart.

WRAITH OF MOZART.—Where's my concerto in B flat?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST—Gone to Yankee-land, with Arabella; but Strakosch and Mapleson object.

WRAITH OF MOZART.—Why?—it's my best!

DRS SERPENT and GHOST.—No. D minor.

WRAITH OF MOZART.—No. B flat.

(Wraith of Mozart vaporates.)

Wraith of Schubert.

WRAITH OF SCHUBERT (in a sepulchral tone.)—Where's my sonata in D?

DR SERPENT.—Gone, with Arabella, to Yankee-land; but they will have nothing but Liszt and Co.

WRAITH OF SCHUBERT.—Annette is in London. She saw me t'other night in vision.

DR GHOST.—What Annette?

WRAITH OF SCHUBERT.—Annette Essipoff. She can play't. Why not?

DR SERPENT—D. A. C. serves her out the "three R's."

WRAITH OF SCHUBERT.—Who, by Abbs! are the "three R's"?

DR GHOST (emphatically.)—Rubinstein, Raff, and Rheinberger.

(Wraith of Schubert vaporates.)

DR GHOST.—Serpent, hadn't we better go back to Purgatory?

DR SERPENT.—Why ——

Wraiths of J. S. Bach, Friedemann Bach, D. Scarlatti, and Handel.

WRAITH OF HANDEL.—Where are my Six Fugues that don't belong to the Suite de Pièces?

WRAITH OF J. S. BACH.—Where my fugues and preludes that don't belong to the 48?

WRAITH OF FRIEDEMANN BACH.—Where my unearthed fantasias?

WRAITH OF DOMENICO SCARLATTI.—Where my fugues in F minor and D minor?

DR SERPENT.—O by Abbs!—let's get out of this!

DR GHOST.—O by Adnan!

THE FOUR WRAITHS (in unison).—Where?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST (in unison).—All in Yankee-land with Arabella. (Wraiths vaporate.)

DR SERPENT.—We have had enough.

DR GHOST.—They are going to play a trio by Joachim —

DR SERPENT (interrupting him).—Joseph?

DR GHOST.—No; Raff.

DR SERPENT.—O by Abs!

DR GHOST.—O by Adnan!

Wraith of Beethoven.

WRAITH OF BEETHOVEN.—Where's my Op. 106?

DRS SERPENT and GHOST (trembling before that Shade).—Hans has taken it to Yankee-land.

WRAITH OF BEETHOVEN.—I confided it to Arabella. No one else can play it.

DR GHOST.—Mortier de Fontaine?

WRAITH OF BEETHOVEN.—No.

DR SERPENT (shivering).—Hallé?—Bülow?

WRAITH OF BEETHOVEN.—Hallé plays everything. He is my disciple. But he takes three movements slower than I thought. Bülow plays fantastically—with rapidity; but encores himself in the fugue when any body hammers outside.

(Wraith of Beethoven vaporates.)

DR SERPENT.—Ghost, come along.

DR GHOST.—All right—but ——

Wraith of Mendelssohn.

WRAITH OF MENDELSSOHN.—Arthur Chappell, where are my Posthumous works? Where's my B flat Sonata? Where are my Studies? Where's my Sextet?

DRS SERPENT AND GHOST.—With Arabella, in Yankee-land.

WRAITH OF MENDELSOHN.—But she don't play 'em?

DRS SERPENT AND GHOST.—Strakosch and Mapleson object.

WRAITH OF MENDELSSOHN.—Why not in London?

DRS SERPENT AND GHOST.—Study in F requires fingers of lightning; scherzo of sonata, staccatissimo pianissimo unparalelled.

WRAITH OF MENDELSSOHN.—Is not Annette Essipoff with you?

DRS SERPENT AND GHOST.—Yes; but she's engaged (like Annchen Mehlig, t'other prodigy), on Liszt and the "three R's."

(Wraith of Mendelssohn vaporates.)

DR SERPENT.—Ghost, come along. I never was haunted so.

DR GHOST.—All right, I am ready to ——

Wraith of Sterndale Bennett.

WRAITH OF STERNDALE BENNETT.—"G. G.!" Where are my concertos?

DRS SERPENT AND GHOST.—Lucky "G. G." isn't here.

DR GHOST.—Raff him!—I wish he were.

WRAITH OF STERNDALE BENNETT.—August Manns!—where are my concertos?

DR SERPENT.—I am getting tired. Only Arabella cares about playing them, and she's in Yankee-land.

WRAITH OF STERNDALE BENNETT.—Perebo played the F minor at Boston?

DR GHOST.—Mass.?

DR SERPENT.—Yes; Boston (Mass.); but J. S. Dwight abused it.

(Wraith of Sterndale Bennett vaporates.)

WRAITHS (in unison)—Where? Where? Where? Where? (&c.)

DR SERPENT.—This catalogue will never end.

DR GHOST.—Let's skedaddle. I shan't say another word. (Wraiths vaporate.) Come———

Wraith of Sigismond Thalberg.

WRAITH OF THALBERG.—Who plays my music?

DR GHOST.—Arabella.

DR SERPENT.—Even in Yankee-land.

(Wraith of Thalberg vaporates.)

DR GHOST.—I never heard of such a catalogue.

DR SERPENT. Nor any one else. Yet Bülow put Arabella among Mdme Tussaud's wax figures!

DR SERPENT.—Oh!

DR GHOST.—Ah! (Vanish precipitately.)

"BY Jove!"——

Before proceeding, however, I must be allowed to digress a little. Reader, should you be pressed for time; should you feel disinclined to peruse aught not strictly relevant to the subject-matter, properly so called, of this article; should you resemble that unromantic, albeit useful, member of society, a Bagsman, otherwise a Commercial Gent, whose sole anxiety is to push on, as quickly as possible, from one town to another, without caring to turn his head so that he may admire the fine landscape through which he is being whisked by the express, far less to stop an extra hour in a place for the purpose of examining some object of historical value or antiquarian interest; should you aim exclusively at going right ahead, like one of those who, to a saunter along green country lanes and picturesque cross-roads, prefer the shortest route, because it is the shortest route, though it run like a Continental highway, for miles and leagues, between two monotonous rows of lanky, feebly-swaying poplars—skip all that intervenes between this warning and the next paragraph. I want to make a remark or two about the adjuration, "By Jove!" Why, I would fain learn, should we, in the nineteenth century, continue invoking old Father Zeus? If there exists a valid, though occult, reason for our attachment to Heathen Mythology, why have we selected Jupiter, and not any other denizen of Olympus—Mars, Bacchus, Apollo, for instance, or, with due regard to our national mission of ruling the waves, Neptune? Bob Acres informed his friend, Captain Absolute, that he swore according to a well-defined plan. Generally, however, Britons follow in their objurgatory moods a system of unreflecting haphazard. When an Englishman says, "By George, Sir, I'll tell you what," etc., I recognise a certain propriety in the expression. It is an implied appeal to our Patron Saint, whose mounted effigy triumphing over the Dragon adorned the obverse of our guineas, and has recently appeared on our sovereigns. But when the same Englishman, a moment afterwards, breaks out with "By Jingo!" I own I feel puzzled. There is, though, another department, branch, or section of our swearing about which there is no mystery. "Egad!" "Zounds!" and "Ecod!" formerly, like "Dang it!" "Dash it!" and "Drat it!" of more modern diction, prove irrefutably the existence of many people who,

"Letting 'I dare not' wait upon 'I would,'"

and afraid of employing a "good mouth-filling oath," such as Hotspur recommends to his wife, endeavour to gratify their natural taste for malediction without shocking their own conscience or outraging the ears of those who listen to them. These people patronise mock swearing as others wear sham jewelry and false hair. With this, I repeat, "By Jove!" and add that which, save for my digression, would have immediately followed, to wit:

"Just fancy! Last week Sig. Orfeo Buonsuono's new opera, Delitto e Vendetta, was produced at the Teatro delle Muse, in Milan, and the composer was called on forty times! Forty times! What a tremendous success!"

Such, or something to the same effect, we may reasonably assume, would be the language held by an uninitiated person coming across the above account, in an Italian paper, of one of the operatic triumphs achieved from time to time by Italian composers. The conclusion drawn by him would prove the speaker utterly unacquainted with the state of things now obtaining in the dominions of King Victor Emanuel. Forty recalls no more necessarily mean a tremendous success than the dish-covers exposed to view in an ironmonger's shop-window necessarily conceal hot fish, flesh, or fowl beneath their convex and resplendent surfaces. Sig. Buonsuono's Diletto e Vendetta, may be a meritorious production, nay, more: a production of unusual excellence; at the same time, despite the forty recalls which greeted its composer, it may hardly be worth the paper on which it is written, and never destined to be heard of again a month after the first performance. Even if we take a more favourable view of the case, and suppose that Sig. Buonsuono's work was not a failure, we shall, probably, not be far wrong in comparing his success, as heralded in the local papers, to a dish of whipt cream. One need not be a Francatelli or a Soyer to know that an exceedingly small quantity of cream makes a marvellously large show.

When a Spanish Gentleman, bowing to a Spanish Lady, gravely utters the salutation: A los pies de Vd, Señora ("At your feet, Lady"), and the Lady replies in equally pure Castilian: Beso á Vd la mano, Caballero ("I kiss your hand, Cavalier"), the Don does not go down upon his knees, and his fair companion does not act up to her words by performing the osculatory process intimated. They are both using set forms of speech tantamount respectively to: "Good day, Madam; I trust I see you quite well!" and "Thank you, pretty well. I hope you are the same." It is in this spirit that we must interpret the endless recalls which keep an Italian composer continually trotting from behind the scenes and back again during the first performance of his opera before an audience of his fellow-countrymen. We must be on our guard against the glowing reports of triumphs like that of which we have been treating. Otherwise we may be unconsciously imitating the swarthy children of Africa, who, in their transactions with disinterested and philanthropic European traders, give fabulous sums for a few glass beads, or gladly pay the price of a small estate for a pair of old military epaulets and a battered cocked-hat.

It is the fashion to ascribe to Italian climate and Italian temperament the exuberant manifestations of delight characterising Italian audiences. The explanation cannot be accepted as sufficient. Exaggerated enthusiasm is by no means limited to what is termed the Sunny South. We find it in countries much farther north, though its objects are there, perhaps, different. Instead of being expended upon the composers, it takes the form of homage to artists. How many fair vocalists have been escorted to their hotels and serenaded by frantic admirers inhabiting other latitudes than the latitude of Florence or Naples? Popular Prima-Donnas have, ere this, had their carriages drawn by bipeds instead of horses on the other side of the Atlantic, while, at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, some few years ago, the public would suffer scarcely a scene, and seldom an act, to pass without the business of the stage being brought to a standstill in order that first one favourite and then another might advance to bow and smile in return for plaudits not always quite spontaneous, and bouquets sometimes purchased, not by those who flung, but by those who received them. At length the nuisance, which, like opium-smoking or dram-drinking, grows upon those who indulge in it, became so rampant that an official decree was issued, forbidding any artist from responding to a call except between the acts or until after the final fall of the curtain.

When applause is lavished thus profusely, it loses its value as a test of merit. If mediocrity receives outrageous marks of approbation, what is left wherewith to reward true genius? The evil has not yet taken root in England, though signs may be discerned of its having reached our shores. Let those who possess the ability and the power see that it does not spread. Let them educate the British audience as Mr Disraeli educated his party, and let them never tire of advocating one great virtue: discretion. The Victoria Medal must be sparingly and judiciously conferred, if we would not have it degraded to a mere bauble. Extraordinary applause in art should be given only on extraordinary occasions, and as a guerdon for extraordinary efforts, otherwise it runs the danger of degenerating into mere "Sound and fury, Signifying nothing."

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

The Spanish papers have just published the baptismal certificate of the celebrated Adelina Patti, Marquise de Caux, born in the Calle de Fuencarral, at Madrid, and baptised in the Parish Church of San Luis. The following is the document:

"Book of Baptisms, No. 42, leaf 153, second side.—In the town of Madrid, district and province of the same name, the 8th April, 1843, I, Don José Losada, vicar of the Parish of San Luis, have solemnly baptised a female child, born at four o'clock in the afternoon of the 19th February of the current year, and legitimate daughter of Sig. Salvator Patti, Professor of Music, born at Catania in Sicily, and of Signora Caterina Chiesa, born at Rome; the grandfather and grandmother by the father's side being Sig. Pietro Patti and Signora Concepcion Marino, natives of Catania; and, on the mother's, Sig. Giovanni Chiesa, born at Venice, and Signora Casseli, born at Marino, in the States of the Church. The child was named Adela Giovanna Maria.

"There were present at the baptism, as godfather, Sig. Guiseppe Sinico, Professor of Music, born at Venice, and, as godmother, Signora Rosa Manora Sinico, born at Cremona, in Lombardy, whom I admonished of the spiritual relationship they assumed by this act; and, as witnesses, Juliano Huezal and Casimiro Garcia, born at Madrid, sacristans of this parish.

"In attestation whereof I have drawn up, signed, and delivered the present certificate the 8th April, etc. José Losada."

Adelina Patti's parents were artists highly esteemed at the Grand Opera, Madrid.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

A series of "Saturday Evening Popular Concerts" has been announced at Langham Hall, Great Portland Street, under the management of Dr. Bernhardt. The first took place on Saturday last, when the following artists assisted:—Vocalists—Miss Mary Grace Erica, Mdlle. Mellanie Uttella, Miss Kate Ormond, Miss Helene Arnim, and Mr Percy Rivers; instrumentalists—Mr Jacques Rosenthal, Mr Lutgen, Mr Aenton Hartvigson, the sisters Arneni and Lilly. The vocal music was accompanied on the pianoforte by Herr Lehmeyer, Mr Nils Chrisander, and Mr. J. W. Bernhardt.

A grand evening concert took place Dec. 10, at the Horns Concert Rooms, Kennington Park, by the South London Musical Society, the principal vocalists being the Misses Coghlan and Cockburn, Mr S. Braden, and Mr Ch. J. Bishenden, the popular bass. Amongst the best vocalisms were "Looking back," sung by Miss Cockburn; "Let me like a soldier fall," Mr Braden; "The brave old oak," given in fine style by Mr Bishenden; in response to a hearty encore, he sang "To the woods;" Mr Bishenden was accompanied by the full band in "A warrior bold," and, as an encore, repeated the last verse. Several glees were also included in the programme. A violin solo, by de Beriot, was played by Mr Beckwith; an instrumental quartet, by Messrs Benson, Schomberg, Mackie, and Rhodes, and a pianoforte solo by Mr Kirby. The accompanists were Messrs Wareham and Cox. Mr Mackie conducted.

The Musical Artists' Society had their fifth trial for the season 1875 of new compositions, on Saturday evening last, at the rooms of the Royal Academy of Music, by the kind permission of the committee of management. The following is a list of the compositions played and sung:—Quartet, in D, for two violins, viola, and violoncello (J. Lea Summers), Messrs. Ralph, Rendle, Webb, and Pettit; "A song of the sea" (W. H. Sangster), Mr. Walter Bolton; two sketches for pianoforte "The watermill," and "The wreathed garland" (J. Parry Cole), Mr. Henry Baumer; two songs, "Serenade" (J. Raff), and "In a distant land" (Taubert), Miss Mary Davies; song (R. O'Leary Vinning), Miss Mary Davies; quartet, in A flat, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello (H. Westrop), Mrs. Algernon Bathurst, Messrs. Ralph, Webb, and Pettit; ballad, "The ebb of tide" (Miss O. Prescott), Mdlle. De Harpe, accompanied by the composer; impromptu, in A flat (Eaton Faning), Mr. Eaton Faning; song, "The pine-tree" (C. H. Couldery), Mr. Walter Bolton; duet, serenade, "If thou art sleeping, maiden" (L. N. Parker), Miss Geddes and Miss Russell; quartet, in A major, for two violins, viola, and violoncello (Jacob Bradford), Messrs. Ralph, Rendle, Webb, and Pettit. At the pianoforte, Mr. Arthur O'Leary. The rooms were well attended, and the audience were both attentive to the performances and encouraging to the artists. The Society deserves the support of all interested in rising musical talent; and who is not?

On Thursday, the 2nd inst., a concert was given at the Masonic Hall, Wood Green, under the direction of Mr H. Weist Hill, in aid of the three assistant masters of St John's College, who suffered so severely at the late fire at Mr Crudan's establishment. The singers were Mdlle Stella and Mr Hugo. Mr H. Weist Hill's violin playing was received with rapturous applause. Miss Nellie Sabal cleverly accompanied him on the pianoforte. Mdlle Stella and the Misses Sabal, met with warm applause, the former after her songs, and the latter after their pianoforte performances. Mr Heine Hugo, the moving spirit in getting up the concert, after singing the "Yeoman's Wedding," received a burst of applause such is but seldom heard—says the North Middlesex Chronicle—and many would have liked to have heard it a third time, although, perhaps, the greatest effect was produced, and certainly his voice was heard to greater perfection, in "A warrior bold." Notwithstanding the state of the weather, the hall was crowded, and we trust that a considerable sum may be found to have been raised by the united efforts of those who took part in the proceedings.

PROVINCIAL.

EDINBURGH.—ORGAN PERFORMANCE.—A very enjoyable organ recital was given on Thursday afternoon the 9th inst., by Professor Oakeley, in the University Music Class-room. The opening piece—says The Scotsman—was one of the most universal favourites among Handel's organ concertos. A bright, melodious minuet from Mozart's Divertimento, for strings, followed. The remaining numbers, were—the slow movement of Beethoven's sonata Op. 7, No. 4, the so-called "Pilgrim's March," and the minuet from Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the Prayer from Mosé in Egitto, the Gavotte from Bach's sixth violin sonata, and a very effective march from the Martyrdom of St Polycarp, an oratorio produced some twenty years ago by Sir F. Gore Ouseley. All the pieces were played with the performer's usual taste and skill; the impassioned earnestness in Beethoven's Largo was well brought out; and the orchestral effects in the minuet and trio of Mendelssohn's Symphony were wonderfully rendered. Interesting and beautifully got-up analytic programmes, profusely illustrated with musical type, were circulated in the class-room.

DERBY.—Under its new title, the Midland Musical Society (formerly known as the Derby Glee and Madrigal Society) gave its opening concert for the season on the 7th inst. Mr Kempton, organist of All Saints', is the energetic and excellent conductor. On the occasion referred to he was ably assisted by Mr Houseley, as organist, and a small string band; Mr J. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac., presiding at the pianoforte. The principal artists were Mdme Billinie Porter, Miss Edith Clelland, and Mr Kenningham. The first part of the concert consisted chiefly of Sullivan's On Shore and Sea, the final chorus of which had to be repeated. The duet, "Here on thy heart," was beautifully rendered by Mdme B. Porter and Mr Kenningham. The second part consisted of sundry glees, four-part songs, &c. The concerted music was well sung. In the valse, "L'Ardita," Mdme B. Porter was warmly encored, and responded by singing, "Within a mile of Edinboro' town." Macfarren's "My own, my guiding star," sung by Mr Kenningham, was enthusiastically applauded, and Miss Clelland was fairly successful in the songs rendered by her.

WORCESTER.—The second of Mr Spark's series of concerts was given at the Music Hall on Tuesday evening, the 7th inst. The performances of Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Emily Dones, Miss Emma Barnett, Mr Bernard Lane, Mr Robert Hilton, and Chevalier Lemmens excited great interest, and the programme was exceptionally attractive. The chief feature was a selection from Wagner's Lohengrin, very efficient aid—says Berrow's Worcester Journal—being contributed by Miss Barnett and Chevalier Lemmens, who played the accompaniments. The second part was miscellaneous, and commenced with the quartett, "Un di si ben," (Rigoletto). Then came one of the gems of the concert, a pianoforte solo (fantasia on The Ancient Mariner), by Miss Emma Barnett, a sister and pupil of Mr J. F. Barnett. "Miss Barnett's recent performances in London have placed her in the first rank of rising artistes. The part she took in the concert on Tuesday, both as accompanist and soloist, was worthy of her reputation, and that of the talented composer by whose instructions she has so greatly profited. In mere mechanical manipulation she is thoroughly accomplished, while the well-directed taste, the delicacy and firmness of touch, and the legitimate way in which all her effects were made, procured her an enthusiastic encore."

BEDFORD.—Mr H. R. Rose is to be congratulated on the highly successful issue of his first public recital. As an aspirant for a share of popular favour—says the Bedford Times—he showed himself to be an accomplished pianist, and created a favourable impression as an interpreter of classical music. A large audience assembled in the New Corn Exchange to support the débutant, who was assisted by two fellow students at the Royal Academy of Music, Miss Mary Davies (Welsh Union Scholar), and Mr Howells. Mr Rose (who is the son of Mr Rose, organist of St Paul's), opened the concert with Mendelssohn's Introduction and Fugue in E minor (Op. 35), his execution of which piece was easy and effective. Blumenthal's song "The Message" was then very gracefully rendered by Mr Howells. Schubert's "Impromptu in G" (Op. 90) was well played by Mr H. R. Rose, and the "Toccata" (Op 38) of Sterndale Bennett was brilliantly rendered. Miss Davies sang "Voi che sapete," accompanied by Mr Rose, sen., and a hearty encore was given, which was acknowledged only by a bow. A "Study" by Henselt and another by Chopin, in F, were played by Mr Rose with great effect, almost entirely from memory. A pleasing duet was sung by Miss Davies and Mr Howells, "O that we two were maying." The second part opened with two "Bourrées" (in A major and A minor), by Bach, spiritedly rendered by Mr Rose, and received with much applause. Miss Davies then sang Sullivan's "Let me dream again" admirably. An enthusiastic recall was the result. Mr Rose played two valses (in C sharp minor, and D flat major), by Chopin, with his usual ability, after which Mr Howells sang "Come into the garden, Maud." The fantasia on the Prayer from Mosé in Egitto, by Thalberg, was a fine performance, and won an encore. The recital of Mr Rose was successful in a professional and in a popular sense. It enabled him to display his best qualities as a pianist to the highest advantage.

PIANISTS PAST AND PRESENT.

To but few members of the audience of any musical performance of importance is that performance "just itself, and nothing more." Held, as concerts of note generally are, in those chief temples that are Music's halting-places in her flights about the earth, it becomes the first of a long vista of memories whose vanishing-point is determined by the listener. Therefore, when aspirants to public favour ascend any of those platforms consecrated by that favour to the service of musical Art, they challenge measurement with their predecessors, against whose shadowy figures in the background they must stand in striking relief, or fail.

That some artists seize upon, and retain, the public taste, while others, who, by their equal development, seem to be also equal in their natural gifts, produce but a transient impression, is indicative of the existence of some power in the one, too subtle for its absence to be fairly detected in the other. Two artists may be heard in the same work (let us say a classical work, admitting but little legitimate variation in the treatment), they may evince such uniform understanding and capability to produce an echo of their conceptions in the minds of their hearers, that the critic finds difficulty in his classification of their merits: yet the public seems to feel no difficulty in the matter, almost coolly overlooking the one, and awarding lavish marks of approval to the other.

Why? The public does not wish to be unjust, and justice is proverbially to be had from the human multitude. There must be some reason for this spontaneous discrimination, and a valid reason too. We imagine it to be this. The effect of certain music, interpreted with care and judgment, would be much the same, were its executant the possessor of moderate talent, or extraordinary gifts; but the moderate talent would not be able to conceal that it was exhibiting its ultimatum, while the extraordinary gifts would peep out of the prescribed bounds, showing that its doings were but specimens of a rich mine of wealth.

On reflection, most of the executive artists who have left their impression upon the general mind will have proved themselves possessed of an uncommon power, whether their exercise of that power has been admirable or not. It is a deplorable fact that genius in many cases disposes its possessor to the erratic and eccentric, rather than the legitimate; deplorable because that genius compels an audience to yield up their calm judgment and accept its standard, true or false, whether they will or no. In a long list of pianists who have more or less influenced the pianoforte-playing world during the last twenty years, two or three well-known names occur which, to the real musician, are synonymous with error, error all the more dangerous because plausible and superficially brilliant. The bearers of these names have disputed popularity, perhaps, with artists penetrated with the sap of the pure and true; but the unlawful genius has carried the day and the general taste in a wrong direction. Why will those genius-possessors stifle that sense of responsibility which should be the foundation of all art-work?

Digitized by Google

A brilliant list, in spite of its dashes of imperfection, containing, among a host of others, such names as Thalberg, the gentleman-artist, whose refined politeness seemed a barrier to his free inquiry into the mysteries of the Muse; Rubinstein, with the savage daring that made him like a Tartar chief, marshalling and arraying the notes like hordes of barbarians; Clara Schumann, of big conceptions and imperfect deeds; Hallé, the tone-mathematician; Pauer, who, if the expression "beauté de diable" were applicable to art, possessed it to the full when he made his first appearance in London in 1851; the brothers Andreoli, Jaëll, Ritter, Lubeck—all the production of "foreign lands,"* a fact that would put us to the blush had we not a single name with which amply to shield ourselves from the imputation of pianist-barrenness—a name now of equal significance in both hemispheres—that of Arabella Goddard, the gentle link between the great minds that are gone and ears that are.

Of late the fair sex has borne away a goodly share of the laurels that are to be won by the aid of that ungainly, long-bodied monster, the concert-grand. The principal attraction to amateur pianists last summer was the charming exposition of classical composers by Madlle Marie Krebs, which has been before reviewed in these columns. A pure artist, free from national warp or personal prejudice, deserves success; and Madlle Krebs has, fortunately, the means at command to obtain it. The autumn brought us two other distinguished foreign ladies—Madlle Anna Mehlig and Madame Annette Essipoff.

Of the former we have much to say in praise. Touch, style, and execution bear traces of a minute labour which few would have the courage to bestow, even upon a much-loved art. A tendency to the dreamily romantic was indicated by her choice of music, no less than by her interpretation of it. Of her selection for her last recital (when with Mdme Essipoff she played Schumann's and Reinecke's duets for two pianofortes), containing a sonata of Weber, a rondo of Schubert, Bach's prelude and fugue (arranged by Lizst), a nocturne of Chopin, and Schubert's "Soirées de Vienne" (Lizst), her most successful effort was undoubtedly "Soirées de Vienne." The interpolated waltz in pianissimo was given with the swing and caprice which makes the German rendering of the waltz a thing apart—inimitable. In the duets with Mdme Essipoff that rare little dame produced a sound that for volume and richness rivals anything that has been yet heard from the pianoforte. Were it lawful to apply the predicable "luminous" to any subject outside the visionary sense, it would better explain the effect of Mdme Essipoff's tone than any in strict justice its own. It was difficult to believe the atmosphere unaffected by those large, resonant sounds.

In conclusion, we will only suggest that we can hardly hear too much of either of these interesting artists. FLAMINGO.

[Our readers must be apprised that the opinions of "Flamingo" are the opinions of "Flamingo."—D. PETERS.]

THE last Saturday concert at the Crystal Palace, for the present year, comes off to-day. The 18th of December being the anniversary of the birth of Carl Maria von Weber, the programme is exclusively devoted to selections from the works of that ever memorable composer.

The last of Mr Arthur Chappell's Saturday Popular Concerts, which, for reasons unnecessary to explain, rival in popularity those of the long-established evening "Mondays," takes place to-day. The pianist on this occasion is Mdme Annette Essipoff, who is going to take a conspicuous part in the "Carnaval," so humorously depicted by Robert Schumann. That, despite her mask (or on account of it, perhaps), Mdme Essipoff will be one of the most eagerly sought out, as the veritable Domino Noir of the occasion, can hardly be doubted.

TURIN.—The operas at the Teatro Regio during the approaching season will be Meyerbeer's Africaine, Ambroise Thomas's Mignon, Verdi's Aïda, and Cleopatra. There will be two ballets: Lionna, o La Vita parigina, by Sig. Borri, and Ermanzia, by Sig. Pratesi.

* It is to be understood that only artists of general and continental renown are alluded to, not musicians entirely resident in England.

A few lines must for the present suffice to record the unqualified success of the great Swedish songstress, who has appeared as Marguerite in Faust, and Leonora in Trovatore, to large audiences, at the Theatre Royal, being supported by Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signors Brignoli, Gillandi, Castelmary, &c. Madame Marie Roze has also played Donna Anna in Don Giovanni, creating a highly favourable impression. Further particulars of the performance next week.

The Italian masters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries knew more about recitation of songs, if not more about the construction of the human voice, than we know.

L'Universo Musicale has the following: "Una lettera di Porto Mahone ci da ragguagli del bel successo ottenuto dai comigi Sabatini e Trafford (tenore e soprano), nel Rigoletto.

A paper by Professor Adams, on the late Sir C. Wheatstone's discoveries in acoustics and inventions in music, is to be read at one of the coming meetings of the Musical Association.

A man over one hundred years old recently died in Brooklyn. As he did not use tobacco, nor drink spirituous liquors, it is supposed his untimely death was caused by some disease inherited at his birth.

The Jubilee Singers are at present fulfilling a round of engagements in the north of England. They sang recently at Chester, having in the afternoon been most hospitably entertained at Hawarden Castle by Mr Gladstone.

An influential section of American writers, headed by the poet William Cullen Bryant, have offered themselves as members of the Association to Protect the Rights of Authors, with which Mr Charles Reade is connected.

The thanks of her Majesty the Queen have been sent to the Rev. M. Bennett of Aberdeen, for a copy of a new ballad entitled "The Banks o' Dee" written by him, and composed by Mr William Crawford, of Glasgow.

Special Christmas Services are to be held in St Anne's Church, Soho, on Wednesday evenings, the 22nd and 29th Dec., at which a portion of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, with full orchestral accompaniment, will be sung as an anthem.

Mr Arthur Sullivan has returned to London, from Glasgow, to which emporium of Celtic enterprise and commerce he will go back early in January, being appointed director in perpetuum of the classical concerts at the newly erected Music Hall.

The editor of the Examiner states with reference to the remark that the poem: Jonas Fisher, was "written either by Mr Buchanan or the Devil," that the phrase did not originate with that journal, which merely discussed a previous rumour to that effect.

Mr Martin F. Tupper has written a drama called Washington, which he hopes to have associated with the Centennial celebration at Philadelphia next year. Arrangements have been made for its production in that city, and Mr Tupper is going over to superintend the preparations.

A new gavotte for full orchestra, the composition of Mr W. F. Taylor, was included in the programme of the orchestral concert at the Crystal Palace on Monday last, and was much admired. A scherzo for full orchestra by the same composer is announced to be given there shortly.

After the revival of the Timbale d'Argent, to which will succeed that of Madame l'Archiduc, the first novelty at the Bouffes-Parisiens will be an operetta, called the Trois Margots, of MM. Bocage and Chabrillat, music by M. Cœdes. The principal character will be played by Madame Théo.

The new theatre in Edinburgh, now approaching completion, on the site of the late Southminster, is to be known hereafter as "The Queen's."

A pianoforte manufactory on an extensive scale is about to be started in Vienna, under the auspices of the Abbé Liszt. The president will be Prince Lichtenstein, the vice-president Herr Hanslick, the well-known critic, and many eminent musicians are on the committee of direction.

Mr Wilkie Collins' new drama, Miss Gwilt, founded on incidents in his well-known novel of Armadale, has been produced at the Royal Alexandra Theatre, Liverpool. The leading characters were sustained by Miss Ada Cavendish, Mr Arthur Cecil, Mr R. C. Lyons, Miss Alma Santon. The piece was well received.

At the Concert given in St James's Hall last Saturday night a new song by Sir Julius Benedict, entitled "I look not towards the setting Sun," was sung by Madame Samson. The fair vocalist was "recalled" four times to receive the applause due no less to the merits of the song than to the charming way in which it was sung.

A gentleman who had left his wife alone in the theatre while he went out to get a whiff of fresh air, apologized on his return, "Dear me," said she, "I thought you went to give me a chance to flirt with that man with the lovely black moustache." She has had no cause to complain of any want of attention from her husband since.

The following are the names of the candidates for the degree of Bachelor of Music in the examination at Cambridge on the 7th, who are approved: St John's College—Henry Fisher, Francis Edward Gladstone, John Shepherd Liddle, George Marsden; Trinity College—Henry Cotter Nixon; Queen's College—Joseph William Westbrook.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—During the whole of next week the attractive performances of the Jackley Troupe of gymnasts, of Romah, the celebrated athlete, and of Miss Anderson, in her light and dark séances, will be continued. Adonis, the marvellous miniature man from South Africa, will hold his daily receptions in the Saloon adjoining the Central Hall. On Tuesday, the grand Christmas Pantomime, entitled Harlequin the Yellow Dwarf; or, the King of the Gold Mines, will be produced, and in this Mr George Conquest will appear. On Saturday (Christmas Day) the Palace will be closed, and the Park only will be open to season ticket holders.

Mr Campbell Clarke, who so worthily represents in Paris the Daily Telegraph, and has just been created a member of the Legion of Honour, for the active share he took in the English Subscription in favour of the sufferers by the French inundations, is well known to artists and literary men on both sides the Channel. It is Mr Clarke who, by means of a telegraphic wire, laid down at his office in the Place du Nouvel Opéra, transmitted to London notices of the first performances at our Paris theatres the very night they have taken place, so that next morning the Paris papers are frequently distanced by the Daily Telegraph. It is hardly necessary to observe that this electric wire transmits, before aught else, Mr Clarke's political and financial messages, but the stage, also, profits by it, in the most cordial and sympathetic manner; for the representative of the Daily Telegraph is passionately fond of art and literature.—Le Ménestrel.

"SIR LUCIUS" IN A HURRY.—A few days since Mr Charles Wyndham left Brighton for the Crystal Palace, to play Sir Lucius O'Trigger in The Rivals. The performance commenced at three o'clock, and was not concluded till a quarter to six. Mr Wyndham was in a dilemma, knowing that he had to catch the five minutes to six express from the Low Level Station (which is ten minutes' walk from the Palace) to Brighton, in order to appear, at eight o'clock, as Bob Sackett, at the Theatre Royal. He dared not disappoint the Brighton audience, and, having no time to change Sir Lucius O'Trigger to Mr Charles Wyndham, he at once crammed his private attire into a bag, rushed through the crowd to the train, and just managed to seat himself in a first-class carriage before the guard blew his whistle for the start. Great was the surprise of the other five occupants of the compartment on seeing a gentleman of the last century, with crimson velvet coat and vest, white breeches, silk stockings, gorgeous knee buckles, and powdered hair (Mr Wyndham generally preferring this to a court wig), with a fashionable overcoat of the present day. There was a general buzz. Was he a mountebank or a madman? The mysterious stranger, caring little for the curiosity he had excited, enveloped himself in his rug and sank to sleep. At Brighton he jumped out of the train into a carriage, and dashed from the station, before the passengers had time to ask the guard what the vision signified. Soon afterwards Sir Lucius was transformed into Bob Sackett, declaring of each fair damsel he encountered, "The more and more I see her, the more and more I love her."

It appears from the British volumes of patents that a patent for a sewing machine exactly like that of Elias Howe was granted in 1790 by his Majesty King George III. to Thomas Saint, of Greenhill's Rents, in the Parish of St Sepulchre, county of Middlesex, England. It is described in the specifications as "a machine for stitching and sewing."

Mr Tom Taylor's historical play, Anne Boleyn, is now in rehearsal, and will be produced at the Haymarket Theatre on the 17th of January. Miss Neilson, as the heroine, is provided with a strong part. Miss Dietz and Miss Walton are also included in the cast, which is a very large one. Mr Arthur Matthison has been engaged to sustain the character of Sir Thomas Wyat.

Mr Cave's Christmas piece at the Alhambra will be an operatic extravaganza founded upon the loving ballad of "Lord Bateman." The music will be partly composed and partly selected by M. Jacobi. The scenery is being painted by Mr Albert Calcott. The costumes have been designed by Mr Alfred Maltby. The libretto is written by Mr Sydney French, and the entire plot and mise-en-scène constructed and placed upon the stage by Mr J. A. Cave.

The book, as a companion, is always at your service, always willing and pliable. You meet with men of service, good thinkers, good speakers, and you do not know how to draw them out, but a book is always open to your wish, and shuts when you desire, something which your professor might not do. In saying these things for books, I do not forget that they are merely secondary. When the mind itself opens, they have to stand aside. Their greatest benefit is that by causing this same opening of the mind they save us from themselves.—EMERSON.

STRALSUND.—Der Haide Schacht, the favorite opera by Herr Holstein, has been well received here.

COLOMBANO.—Sig. Ignaazio Pasini, the once celebrated tenor, died in this, his native, place, on the 8th inst. He was 79 years of age.

STUTTGART.—The Brothers Louis and Willy Thern, assisted by Mdlle Manuela Simon, recently gave a concert in the new Liederhalle, or "Hall of Songs."

CARLSRUHE.—Herr Ferdinand Langer's opera of Dornröschen has been successfully performed at the Grand Ducal Theatre. The composer was called on four times.

DRESDEN.—At a meeting of the Elgausängerbund, lately held here, it was determined to offer three prizes of 300, 200, and 100 marks respectively, for the best three-choral compositions by German composers.

VENICE.—The bust of Carlo Goldoni was solemnly inaugurated on the 2nd inst., in the vestibule of the theatre bearing the poet's name. It is a present from Prince Giovanelli, and the work of the sculptor, Sig. Giuseppe Soranzo.

ST PETERSBURG.—M. Saint-Saëns has been stopping with M. Adantschweski, Director of the Conservatory. At the conclusion of one of his Concerts for Chamber Music, he was warmly congratulated by the Grand Duke Constantine, who invited him to dinner.

BAYREUTH.—It is reported that Wagner has given up all notion of visiting London this winter, as he intended. He is much fatigued by his recent exertions in getting up Tannhäuser at Vienna.

MILAN.—The season at the Scala will be inaugurated by Verdi's Vespri Siciliani and the ballad of Michelangelo Rolla. The list of operas to be given includes Gioconda, by Sig. Ponchielli; Luce, by Sig. Gobati; Charles VI., by Halévy; and La Favorita, by Donizetti. The second ballet will be La Source, by M. St Léon.

NAPLES.—At the suggestion of the Cavaliere Florimo, Director of the Musical Archives, a Committee, headed by the Cavaliere Lauro Rossi, Director of the Conservatory of Music, has been formed for the purpose of erecting a statue to Bellini. The Cavaliere Florimo has offered to head the subscription list with the sum of 1,000 francs.

LISBON.—Signor H. L. Bellini, of the Royal Italian Opera House, London, made his début last month, as the Marquis in Linda, with success, assisted by Signore Vitali, Augusti, and Rossi; Signori Rota, Corsi, and Vidal. The season commenced on the 29th of October, with Lucrezia Borgia, with Signore Sasse and Rossi; Signori Rota and Corsi. Faust was the next opera given, with Signore Vitali and Rossi; Signori Vidal, Augusti, Bardoni, and Reduzzi. This was followed by Rigoletto—Signore Vitali and Rossi; Signori Corsi and Barboni taking the chief parts. After Rigoletto came the Ballo in Maschera, in which Signor Augusti (tenor) made a good success. The placing of the opera upon the stage is very primitive for a "grand theatre." A new opera, L'Elisi di Giovinezza, by Vicont de Arneiros, is in rehearsal. Signor Bellini is to have a very important part in it, and is studying it under the composer's direction.

LAST SET

OF

Four Songs

COMPOSED BY

WM STERNDALE BENNETT

(OP. 47).

*No. 1.MAIDEN MINE.
2. SUNSET.
*3.DANCING LIGHTLY.
4. STAY, MY CHARMER.

Price 4s. each.

Of this Set of Songs, the first three are not strictly posthumous works, as they were printed and quite ready for publication at the time of the composer's death. The fourth existed only in Manuscript.

* Sung by Mr SHAKESPEARE at the first Monday Popular Concert of the Season, St James's Hall, on Monday, Nov. 8, 1875.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Mr Shakespeare brought forward two unknown songs by the late Sterndale Bennett, set to some graceful stanzas from the pen of Mr T. Case. Both are the genuine products of an experienced pen, instinct with that melodious charm and refinement of detail for which even the least ambitious of their composer's works are distinguished. Musicians may give preference to the first—'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer"; but the majority of the uninitiated will, we think, find most sympathy with the second—'Maiden Mine'—as unpretending and perfect a ballad as can be imagined."—Times, 10th November, 1875.

"Two charming effusions by Sterndale Bennett, recently published under the titles, 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.' Both are destined to be favourites."—Daily Telegraph, 10th November, 1875.

"Mr Shakespeare introduced two new songs by Sir Sterndale Bennett, as delicious and elegant as anything that ever fell from his pen, the titles of which are 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.'"—Standard, 9th November, 1875.

THE MUSIC BY

J. W. DAVISON.

PRICE 4s. each.

LONDON: DUNCAN DAVISON & CO., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The most interesting feature was, perhaps, the singing by Mdme Nilsson of two songs by Mr J. W. Davison, a gentleman who, in his capacity of composer, is much too little known. The ballads we allude to were 'I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden,' one of a set of vocal illustrations of Shelley, and 'Sweet Village Bells,' words by the late Desmond Ryan; the music in either case being of high artistic merit, and worthy the notice of the famous artist to whom the public are indebted for their acquaintance with the compositions. Mdme Nilsson's success was unequivocal, the vocalist being recalled to the platform no less than three times."—Concordia.

M. NIEDZIELSKI, having just finished several Provincial Engagements, the most recent of which was at Brighton, where he was enthusiastically received, can now accept ENGAGEMENTS, Singly, or with his Vocal and Instrumental Concert Party, in London or the Country. The Coventry Standard says: "The great Polish violinist, M. Niedzielski, cannot be too highly praised. Suffice it to say that his marvellous execution upon the violin evoked deserved and enthusiastic applause, the performer being brought before the foot-lights again and again." He has also been as highly praised by foreign and London journals. Address, Care of DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

HERMANN FRANKE (Concertmeister, from Dresden) Principal Violin and Soloist of Mr Edward De Jong's Orchestra, Manchester, begs that all applications for ENGAGEMENTS as Soloist, and for Lessons, in London and elsewhere, be addressed to Mr W. BEAUTY SLEEPS. Words by Sir WALTER SCOTT. Music by CHARLES B. BRAHAM. 4s. "Upon this song—the composition of a man who has long ere this made his mark as a composer, and who can claim the honour of being a son of the most celebrated tenor vocalist England has ever known—we have already commented, when it was first introduced into the score of Fleur de The, at the Criterion Theatre. Sir Walter Scott's poem is thoroughly well known, and the melody to which it is set is more than usually pretty and captivating. The amateur tenor who can sing 'Beauty Sleeps' with due expression will find it one of the most charming things of the sort he has seen for some time."—Figaro, Dec. 18th, 1875. R. DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Times.")

The concert at St James's Hall on Saturday afternoon was one of very considerable interest. It began with the quartet of Johannes Brahms, in G minor (Op. 25), for pianoforte and stringed instruments, performed by Mesdames Annette Essipoff and Norman-Neruda, MM. Zerbini and Pezze. This quartet, like most of the works of its composer, gains by closer familiarity, and, in the hands of the artists above-named, we need scarcely add that the execution was everything that could be wished. Madame Essipoff, thoroughly familiar with the modern school of pianoforte music, now so much in vogue, in resorting to Brahms went to the best and most fruitful source. The quartet was listened to from beginning to end with great attention by an audience that filled every part of St James's Hall, and each successive movement was applauded. The piece selected by the accomplished Russian pianist for her solo display was Schumann's "Carnaval," from which, with great judgment, she picked out the most attractive numbers. The "Carnaval" is one of the early productions of Mendelssohn's Leipsic contemporary, friend, and, as some would make him, rival. As it stands in the original, it is a lengthy and more or less disjointed series of fragments. But it contains much that is beautiful, and, if discreetly abridged, can hardly fail to please. Madame Essipoff enters into the spirit of the music heart and soul, and makes nothing of the difficulties that here and there place it beyond the reach of ordinary executants. She gave to each division of the work its characteristic significance, which, considering the marked individuality of expression demanded by movement after movement, is no easy task. Mechanical facility was combined with still higher qualities. Schumann himself would have been satisfied. Madame Essipoff was repeatedly applauded, called three times at the end of the performance, and compelled, by the unanimous desire of the audience, to play again. Instead of repeating the "Carnaval," however—which would have been too great a tax—she substituted another piece, her choice falling upon one of the most graceful and charming bagatelles from the fluent and productive pen of Dr Ferdinand Hiller. This was Madame Essipoff's last appearance for the season, and she had every reason to be satisfied with so hearty and genuine a leave-taking—or, as every amateur of finished pianoforte-playing must wish, "au revoir." With so much of the new school in the programme, it was wise to finish with one of those long-accepted masterpieces which must remain ever fresh while art endures, and upon which, to employ the well-known phrase of Byron, "Time writes no wrinkle." Haydn has bequeathed to us not a few of such masterpieces, and the stringed quartet in E flat, which brought Saturday's concert to an end, is by no means one of the least remarkable. It was admirably given by Madame Norman-Neruda, MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Pezze. No violinist reads Haydn's music more truthfully, or plays it with more grace, facility, and unaffected expression, than Madame Norman-Neruda. She shines in it as in the music of Mozart, and, to name one particular example, in the plaintive and beautiful "A minor" quartet of Schubert. There is nothing exaggerated in this lady's playing; all is pure and genuine, without any attempt at individual display. Absorbed in the task before her, she is unconscious of self. Thus, and thus only, ought such music to be rendered—music which seems to spring unbidden from the exhaustless fountain of melody, and yet coming only to the gifted few. The singer at this concert was Mr Thurley Beale, a "barytone bass" who makes progress both in his art and in public opinion. The accompanist was Sir Julius Benedict—how often shall we have to say, facile princeps.

Mr Arthur Chappell's ante-Christmas series of performances has been more than usually interesting, and not the less so because the programmes have been in a large measure drawn from the works of those great dead masters for the popularisation of which the "Monday Popular Concerts" were especially instituted. We have had but two novelties of any consequence—viz., a pianoforte trio in D minor, by Herr Bargiel, and another, in C minor, by Herr Joachim Raff, neither of which is entitled to any marked consideration. As pianists, we have had Madame Essipoff; Mdlle Anna Mehlig, slowly but surely, advancing to the highest rank in her profession; Mr Charles Hallé, who, with Madame Arabella Goddard, Herr Joseph Joachim, and Signor Piatti, may be said to have laid the first stone of the now solid edifice; and Miss Agnes Zimmermann, whom the public is always only too glad to welcome. As leading violinists, may be named Herr Wilhelmj, of whose exceptional talent it would be superfluous to speak; Herr Ludwig Straus, and Madame Norman-Neruda. The first Monday Popular Concert of the new year is announced for the 10th of January, when the pianist is to be Mdlle Marie Krebs, and Signor Piatti, violoncellist of violoncellists, again will take the post which, with rare intervals, he has occupied from the beginning.

CHRISTMAS DAY, 1875.

And Christmas day has come again,
Sweet bells ring merrily;
Glad souls respond to every peal
And hail the sounds with glee.

Ah! day of sad, sad memories
In many an aching brain,
What scenes of long departed years
Will start to life again?

I mind a time, a golden time,
When hearts would light hearts greet,
The sudden burst of those sweet bells,
And every pulse would beat.

When friends and kin were wont to meet
In bonds of unity;
Ah! Christmas days of auld lang syne
Were sunny days with me.

With harmless mirth at even-tide
To wile away the hour;
Oh! those were happy, happy nights,
Those Christmas nights of yore.

No more, no more, by my lone hearth
I brood o'er visions flown,
Though some perchance might wish me near,
I sigh to be alone.

I know I feel that it is wrong,
On this blest favoured day,
To let one cold ungrateful sense
With higher thoughts hold sway.

But spite of all our loftiest hopes,
Our struggles to forget,
Some haunting ills will still intrude
And wring the schooled heart yet.

ADA LESTER.

RATISBON, BAVARIA.

(From a Correspondent.)

The "Musikverein" of Ratisbon began its season, on the 11th, Mr Kreiscassier Spörl, providing an unexceptional programme, the first part of which included Beethoven's Symphony in D major, which, under the direction of Music-Director Carl, was well performed, and received with enthusiasm. The second part began with C. Oberthür's overture Rübezahl, which meritorious work is well known in the chief cities of the Continent. It was played here with its usual great effect. Mr Oberthür, whose exceptional talent has been admired by us in former years, played his brilliant harp fantasie, "Souvenir de Londres," in a manner that could not fail to be followed by a vehement recall. Fräulein Marie Gottlieb, from the Royal Opera, Munich, then sang an aria from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, with great success; after which followed Loreley, a legend for orchestra and harp obbligato, by C. Oberthür, who himself played the harp part. This work abounds in beauties, and its orchestration was pronounced by cognoscenti as masterly. Fräulein Gottlieb sang two songs by Brahms and one by Kirchner; she produced great effect with the third song, and was deservedly recalled. Mr Oberthür then played his descriptive piece, "Clouds and Sunshine," and, being unanimously recalled, gave another brilliant solo, "La Cascade." The concert ended with Weber's overture to Oberon. It was so well attended that it tested severely the capacities of the large room in the Neuhause.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

It is perhaps safe to say that never in the history of the Royal Academy of Music has a concert been given more worthy of its name and pretensions than that which took place at St James's Hall last Wednesday evening week. A very few years ago the abilities of the students were shown under conditions by no means satisfactory, and to contrast what was then done in Hanover Square with the scene presented in St James's Hall is to form a vivid idea of genuine progress and healthy life. Once, it may be allowed, the state of the Royal Academy suggested some excuse for setting up a rival institution. At the present time it furnishes the strongest possible argument against any such course.

The orchestra and chorus employed on the occasion of which we speak consisted exclusively of past or present students of the Academy. So far an old rule was adhered to, but never did the vocalists and instrumentalists give so much reason for pointing to the fact with pride. In strict truth, the band, led by Mr Burnett, one of our ablest violinists, and including such well-known artists as Messrs Watson, Waud, Pettit, White, Svendsen, Horton, Lazarus, Waetzig, and the brothers Harper, was of first-rate quality, while the fresh young voices of the chorus, aided by exceptional individual skill, secured an ensemble of rare excellence. Mr Walter Macfarren conducted with much ability, and nothing was wanting to make the entire executive force able, like the great Duke's Peninsular army, to "go anywhere and do anything."

The first part of the programme contained several interesting examples of the students' powers of composition. First among these as to order was the opening movement of a symphony in C minor by Mr Eaton Faning. If we mistake not, this had been previously heard, but none the less were the audience impressed by the ability it displayed. Mr Faning has not yet acquired a style of his own, many of the details of his work showing the influence of Mozart, while the broader features suggested that of Beethoven. But the composer is very young, and we have no right to demand more from him than evidence of those powers of expression which will serve him in good stead when he has distinctive things to say. The next work was a MS. cantata on the subject of the divine attribute of mercy, composed by Mr A. H. Jackson. This is an ambitious effort, but the result proved that in sanctioning its performance Professor Macfarren was well advised. The cantata contains five numbers, of which two, capitally sung by Mr Wadmore, are written for baritone solo, and one is a choral recitative. It may be objected that the work needs relief, but that is simply due to a choice of texts which erred on the score of sameness in character. The composer could be no other than true to his theme, and, within the limits it afforded him, he has done very well indeed. We need not comment upon the numbers in detail. Enough that the impression made generally, and especially by the beautiful chorus, "The Lord is nigh to them," was of a most favourable character. We shall watch Mr Jackson's future efforts with interest and hope. The stuff is in him of which composers are made, and, as far as we are concerned, he shall not want the encouragement which may stimulate him to turn his endowments to the best account. A performance, by Mr Walter Fitton, of Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante in E flat for pianoforte, with orchestra, was fluent and accurate, but seemed to lack power. On the other hand, no objection can be made to the singing, by Miss Kate Brand, of a somewhat uncommon song, "Love and Laughter," the work of Miss Oliveria Prescott. Another success was achieved by Miss Amy Turner Burnett, in Hummel's Introduction and Rondo, "Le Retour à Londres," although the fair young artist might easily have devoted her time to the study of a more interesting work. The second part of the concert was wholly taken up by Mendelssohn's Lobgesang solos by Miss Marie Duval, Miss Mary Davies, and Mr Guy. An orchestra of veterans could hardly have rendered the symphonic movements with greater taste and precision. The result, indeed, was surprising, and reflected the highest credit upon everybody concerned. We might repeat this observation with regard to the vocal numbers, all of which were smoothly and effectively given. Miss Duval sang throughout with true feeling, and gave promise of great future excellence. Miss Davies did good service in an unobtrusive manner, and Mr Guy, though not in his best voice, won applause for his rendering of the tenor solos. To sum up, the concert was a brilliant success, and put the Royal Academy before the public, at a critical time, in the most favourable light. "By their fruits ye shall know them," and to judge the institution according to what was done on Wednesday night is to form the highest estimate of its value.

NOTES UPON NOTES.

DEAR MR MUSICAL WORLD,—From your last Saturday's number, it appears you have a licence to deal in Spirits.—I am half seas over, on "a merry key," at the idea of our Arabella "coming back to (a) Hearing," in "merrie England;" for tho', like a young "Chic-err'ing," she will come back from a-Broad (to St. John's) Wood; for, altho' with rings from her fingers on Broadwood's Grand, she could have Music wherever she goes; yet she has discoursed so often and so eloquently on "Home, sweet Home"—that, although, in coming back, there would be sailing "Over the dark blue waters"—which, by the way, sounds very pretty as a quartet in Oberon, but in reality, with the politest of stewards and stewardesses, is worse than a week's five-finger Exercises at Leipsic—(sic). 'Tis a disgrace to the sect; we go to Chappell—we have the analytical programmes to open our ears and hearts—we can then listen, with all our eyes and ears to the good things provided by that admirable Musical Missionary, King Arthur, supported by his Knights of the Round Table, &c.; then read a well written critique upon the actual performances, when there is such a powerful means of public instruction—to increase intelligent listening, and just appreciation of fine music and fine performances. Where are the hearts, and where are the ears (that deserve pulling) for letting our grand and great pianist leave our shores after so long "talking to us with her fingers"—"Fairy Fingers, whispering Music;" and with such honeyed tones saying, "Where the bee sucks, there lurk I," appealing to hundreds of Benedicts, besides the gifted composer himself? Was it in an ironical mood that the Popular Concerts were established during the Cattle Show, and the admirable "Fish Concerts" at a fashionable watering place? I cannot say for certain what the Beasts may have to say on the subject; nor (although you are kind enough to consider me a Spirit—and that Spirits can be called from the vasty deep, without water) yet, not being on sufficient terms of intimacy with the Fish, except an occasional ramble with a Shrimp or two, I cannot say much about the Fish. Neither have analytical programmes, &c., &c. Yet they seem to understand as well as the bipeds who let Madame Arabella Goddard leave them. Pray, come back—we will try and behave better. Daily Telegraphs will, we trust, bring Daily News of the Hour, when, "Wild" with delight, we shall welcome the Life of the pianoforte, and as she has so often told us—"Life let us cherish." Even figure 0, which amongst figures (not wax) is nought—very naughty and very nice—"Cherubino" would make a grand crescendo. No, as a ghost or spirit, I had made a mistake. Cherubini made a long crescendo in the overture to Anacreon; was it the first invention?—many kind young ladies, I suppose, out of contradiction (and ladies are, I believe, as a rule, rather contradictory) to the "Music of the Future," desire to play like the Ancients, without fortes or pianos. Cherubino, the Page, would turn over a new leaf; and, although betting is, I believe, not allowed amongst spirits, I could lay "Betts" on Madame Arabella being welcomed on all hands, for her hands—proving that, with her, sense is associated with sound, and feeling with judgement—perfection. As a Ghost, you place me in greater company than I could aspire to in a worldly point of view. You call me "Billy;" so I send this billet-doux, as I am home for the holidays.—I remain, yours all right and tight (spirits have a tendency that way), W. H. HOLMES.

Dec. 22, 1875.

P.S.—On re-reading your article of Saturday, I find I am not a spirit. I am very glad of it. Glad on't—as E. J. Loder's Bath aunt used to say, when she went upstairs.

[The genial merriment and hearty kindness of our dear old friend and honoured master are in suit with Christmas; but he has reckoned without his "Arabella." She is not coming back.—D. P.]

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

Christmas performances of Handel's greatest oratorio are always well attended, and scarcely need the co-operation of eminent aristes to secure that result. Apart from such help, however, it may be doubtful whether the public, in numbers sufficient to fill the vast area of the Albert Hall, would have braved the disagreeable weather of Monday night, and taken a more or less long journey to Kensington. The added attraction, it must be owned, was very great. Not often during the season of oratorio do amateurs have a chance of hearing the Messiah solos interpreted by vocalists of such eminence as Madame Christine Nilsson, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Mr Lloyd, and Signor Foli—a quartet of rare distinction, if not, as regards all its members, thoroughly trained in the style of music they had to sing. Madame Nilsson and Madame Trebelli belong emphatically to another school than that of Handelian oratorio, but the fact will hardly be disputed that when artists of such powers address themselves conscientiously to any task the result is interesting and attractive as a matter of course, while it may offer features of a peculiar value. Such an audience as then listened to the Messiah do not unanimously bestow favour without very good reason, and the encores exacted for Madame Trebelli's "He shall feed His flock," and demanded, but not granted, for Madame Nilsson's "I know that my Redeemer liveth," are better testimony than any we could give to the merit of those performances. Miss Anna Williams rendered efficient help in the soprano solos of less importance; Mr Lloyd was, as always, thoroughly satisfactory; and the superb voice of Signor Foli gave much effect to the music he had to sing. The band and chorus were so far up to their work that only on rare occasions have the concerted numbers been more satisfactorily presented. A good choral performance of the Messiah is looked for with perfect justice, and any result less than good entails no ordinary disgrace; but it sometimes happens that the very familiarity of the theme leads to fatal carelessness in its treatment. On this occasion the rendering of the choruses was, generally speaking, above the average, and deserved proportionate eulogy. Dr Stainer did excellent service at the organ, and Mr Barnby was a conductor with whom it would be hard to find fault.

BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Faust, in which Madame Christine Nilsson made her first appearance on the Birmingham stage, is one of those operas best calculated to display the varied powers of the famous Swedish songstress. Every phase of the character, from Marguerite's first entrance in the "Kermesse" scene, where, with downcast eyes and maidenly reserve, she declines the proffered attentions of the handsome cavalier, through the love passages in the Garden scene, gradually increasing in tenderness and fervour, the horror at her brother's death after the duel, the agony at her unsuccessful efforts to pray in the church, the remorse and madness in the Dungeon—one and all enlisted the sympathies and held spell-bound the attention of the audience. She was worthily supported by Madame Trebelli-Bettini, who gained an "encore" for her charming rendering of Siebel's song. These, to some extent, made amends for the not altogether perfect singing of Signor Gillandi as Faust, and the grotesque impersonation of Mephistopheles by Signor Castelmary. Signor Galassi was a fairly good Valentino, Madame Demeric-Lablache an excellent Marta, and Signor Costa a creditable Wagner. The chorus, particularly in the first act, left much to desire; while the mise-en-scène was incongruously comic. The "Kermesse" was backed up by a sort of Greek temple (which, at first sight, might have been taken for the Birmingham Town Hall), and buildings of hybrid architecture; while one Gothic wing was faced by an old English shop front, with the legendary "M. Brown, Butcher." The church scene was represented by wings of a banqueting hall, with Norman arch at the back, seen through which was a table with dingy red cloth, surmounted by a tea-tray with painted cross. The brass band of the soldiers was evidently native talent, the big drum displaying the words "Police Band" in gilt letters; so that the scenic illusion was not entrancing.

What I recently said as to taste for music was borne out when Don Giovanni was played to about half the audience attracted by Faust. Yet the "cast" was efficient—Madame Marie Roze being an excellent Donna Anna, Mdlle Varesi a good Elvira, and Mad. Trebelli-Bettini (transposition of music allowed for), a lively Zerlina, winning encores for "La ci darem," "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai Carino." Signor Gillandi seemed acquainted with the traditions of the part of Ottavio; and Signor del Puente obtained an encore for the serenade, "Deh vieni;" Herr Behrens, as Leporello, did at least justice to the music; while Signor Zoboli, as Masetto, and Signor Costa, as the Commendatore, each contributed to the effect of a performance deserving of better support. The Trovatore came next; and it is enough to say that Leonora was represented by Madame Nilsson in a manner which delighted all hearers; that Azucena was Madame Lablache, who created a genuine "sensation"; and that the other parts were sustained by Mdlle Bauermeister, Signori Brignoli (Manrico), Galassi (Il Conte), Costa, and Rinaldini. Signor Li Calsi deserves praise for his conducting, and the chorus was better than on the first evening.

Christmas Waits.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—When Heaven, o'erladened with eternal blessings, bent down to earth, a choir of herald angels led the way. Can it be that that celestial band is represented in the present year of grace by the Waits, who now make midnight hideous? Are these harsh tones the echoes, carried down the course of ages, of that heavenly song which broke upon the ears of the enraptured shepherds on the fields of Palestine? No! such cannot be. Sublimity is burlesqued, and the holy Incarnation parodied by brayers and brawlers. Where are the guardians of our sacred mysteries? Why are they silent at the travesty? Where are our musical authorities? The Royal Academy of Music, doubtless, deem such a national matter beneath its lofty consideration, and altogether too low for the occupation of its half-guinea-an-hour professors. Happily it is understood that the National Training School of Music will take the subject under its special protection, and its management will thereby secure the sympathy and support of all corporate bodies. To make our waits angelic, and their strains seraphic, are objects worthy alike of musical mayors and artistic princes. By next Christmas Kensington may turn out groups of performers who will make the welkin ring with sweet carols and glorious songs. In the meantime, while the present order of waits stops the way, I venture to ask, where are the police? Cannot they demand and enforce silence in my court? If they fail, I must apply to the Home Secretary, for I have good reasons for believing these wretched waits are engaged in a vile conspiracy, of which I am the victim. In a few words I will tell you my case. Like most professional gentlemen, I have a large circle of creditors, with whom I have lived for a long time on friendly if not amicable terms; for I have never neglected the subtle uses of "free admission," pleasant manners, and copious promises. In spite of all my tuneful efforts, however, dire discord has appeared. Rough sounds are heard in my doorway, and uncouth noises in my hall, calling for money. No hour of the day have I been able to keep out the ugly Caliban ditties. My annoyance has been extreme—such as only a sensitive and high-souled musician can appreciate; but I have been firm and hard with them, yes, as a bloodless stone. The sneaks, having failed to torture me to madness by day, now try the night. Would you believe it? They have engaged the Waits to repeat their demands in the dead of the night. Yes, yes, I hear the butcher's voice in the ophicleide, the baker's in the trombone, the tailor's in the cornet, the grocer's in the clarinet, the greengrocer's in the hautboy, and all squeal, bray, and roar at me—now in vile unison, and now in hysterical harmony—"money, money. pay us our money!"

May I venture to ask you, my very dear Mr Editor, to suggest means for laying these ghosts, or help me to expose this abominably wicked conspiracy?—Yours truly,

Giovanni Braun.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

Two events, furnishing two fruitful topics of conversation, have recently occurred in connection with the Imperial Operahouse. The first concerns the manager, Herr Jauner, personally. That gentleman has received, from a very high official personage, what is familiarly termed a "wigging," drawn up in high official form, concerning the manner in which the scene of the Venusberg, in R. Wagner's opera of Tannhäuser, is represented. He is informed that it is highly objectionable, and that it is not permissible to introduce into an Imperial establishment the stage business of some low theatre in the suburbs. The reprimand is richly merited, but it should have been addressed not to Herr Jauner but to Herr R. Wagner, for it was he who got up the opera, with all its objectionable details. What Herr Jauner should have done would have been at once to put his veto upon such stage business. The second occurrence to which allusion has been made regards Herr Beck, who, relying upon the terms of his engagement, has refused the part of Telramund in Lohengrin. At first, the manager was inclined to insist that Herr Beck should withdraw his refusal, but, on looking into that gentleman's engagement, it was found he was legally justified in the course he had adopted. The matter, of course, has lost nothing in the telling. Like all other such matters "vires acquisivit eundo." It was reported that R. Wagner had, in Herr Jauner's presence, grossly insulted Herr Beck, who had in consequence applied for a warrant against him.

A comical incident, not included in Herr R. Wagner's stage business, happened in the hunting-scene of the first act during the last performance of Tannhäuser. As he was mounting his gallant steed, one of the singers trod on another artist—a member of the pack which figures among the personages of the drama. The four-footed performer began barking loudly with pain. His canine companions followed his example, and then the whole pack modulated into a continuous howl, which ran through the entire finale. The great mass of the audience laughed, but some ardent Wagnerites were highly indignant at the endless melody thus unexpectedly contributed by the hounds.

A few days since, a journeyman shoemaker, named Carl Sladek, managed to make his way into the apartments occupied by Herr Wagner, at the Hôtel Impérial, and to steal a gun, the property of Mdlle Brunhilde Wahnfrida Utechk, lady's maid to Mad. Cosima Wagner. The thief did not, however, touch two stall-tickets for the next performance of Tannhäuser, though they were lying close to the gown. Sensible thief! By the way, did Miss Utechk rejoice in the high sounding names of Brunhilde Wahnfrida from infancy, or has she been nominally mediævalised, since she has devoted her energies to attending on Mad. Cosima's back-hair?

The general rehearsals of Lohengrin at the Imperial Operahouse are well advanced. Mad. Friedrich-Materna, Herr Scaria, and Say retain their old characters. Herr Müller impersonates the hero. Great difficulty was experienced in finding representatives for Elsa and Telramund. The choice has at length fallen upon Mad. Kupfer and Herr Nollet, respectively. Herr Wagner talks of leaving Vienna about the end of the present month. A month earlier than he originally intended. Ominous! The world will be favoured, it is to be dreaded, with a second Communication to my Friends. Poor translators!

At the end of the year, Mad. Louise Dustmann will cease to be a member of the company at the Imperial Operahouse, and retire on a pension. A complimentary benefit will be given her. Though she leaves the stage, she will still sing at concerts.

MUSIC IN BRUSSELS.

(From a Correspondent.)

The principal, and, indeed, the only fact at the Théâtre de la Monnaie worth recording lately has been the production of Verdi's Messa da Requiem. The solo vocalists were Mesdes Léon Duval, Barlani-Nini, MM. Léon Achard and Povolei. Signor Muzio conducted. The critics praise the work very highly, but the public did not at first manifest much desire to hear it. At any rate, they did not flock in crowds to the earlier performances. A writer in the Guide Musical remarks:

"The execution of Verdi's Requiem was not fortunate enough to draw many people to the Monnaie, despite the attraction naturally belonging to a new work signed by an illustrious name, and despite the success by which it had been preceded. The Brussels public, as a rule, care very little for artistic solemnities, which, in addition to æsthetic gratification—a very subordinate consideration in their eyes—do not, at the same time, offer other sources of amusement in the probable case of the public's being bored. They will gladly pay ten or fifteen francs for the favour of being present at a gala performance. On such an occasion they can, at all events, ogle a varied collection of shoulders more or less resembling alabaster, and admire, in the Royal box, the luxurious ornaments of the reigning princes of Honolulu or Monomotapa. But a musical work, without these incentives to curiosity, never strikes them as worth so exorbitant a price.—'What! Fifteen francs to hear a mass at the theatre!' said a worthy lady, who enjoys the reputation of being a patroness of art. 'Very much thank you! In a church it costs only five centimes.'"

This character of the people of Brussels is drawn by one of themselves. After two performances, the managers, wiser and sadder, fell back upon the ordinary prices. The theatre was crammed. Hereupon the same writer remarks:—

"This success, due to the reduced prices of admission, is extremely characteristic, and may serve as a lesson for the managers. What induced them to believe that the people of Brussels would gladly give fifteen francs to hear an extraordinary work was that, despite the same augmentation, the receipts were magnificent whenever Faure, Patti, or Nilsson have sung here. But the cases are not similar. The Brussels public do not refuse to indulge in a little sacrifice to hear some undisputed artistic celebrity, of whom everyone is speaking, who fills the papers with the noise of his or her exploits, and the extreme rarity of whose appearance among us enhances his or her merit. Fashion, too, has a great deal to do with the matter. There is no one who will not pay heavily for the pleasure of saying to a friend: 'I have heard Patti,' or 'I have heard Nilsson.' This is only a particular form of amour propre. Such is not the case with regard to the Requiem. True, people had talked about it—but cursorily and without attaching much importance to it. There was something to be said both for and against it. Neither amour propre nor fashion were involved—the less so as the notion of a Mass for the Dead shocks persons of timid and pusillanimous disposition. All this was attended with danger, and there were reasons for fearing that the enterprise would turn out a semi-failure. Such has been the result. We have seen that the question of money had a great deal to do with the matter. These considerations would lead us, if we dared, to call the attention of the managers to the point, with especial reference to the approaching performances of Mad. Lucca, who is far from being as famous as Mad. Patti and Mad. Nilsson."

The Guide evidently does not entertain a high opinion of his fellow-citizens, nor is what he says concerning Lucca likely to find acceptance—with Lucca.

The first concert of the Instrumental Union took place in the large Hall of the Grande Harmonie. The instrumental performers were MM. Brassin, Wieniawski, Cornélis, Kes, Joseph Servais, Galkine, Cats, Schnitzler, and Bonman. M. Reubsaet, sang some of Anton Rubinstein's "Mélodies Persanes."

At the second concert of the "Association des Artistes Musiciens," the instrumental features were Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, Hector Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain," a Gavotte by Bach, scored for full band by M. Gevaert, and the "Turkish March," from The Ruins of Athens. There were many vocal pieces, the singers being Madlle Dérivis and M. Bertin and the members of the Choral Society.

STETTIN.—A "secular oratorio," Otto der Grosse, by Dr Lorenz, has been produced.

HERR WILHELMJ'S CONCERT.

A programme more than usually attractive was, as a matter of course, expected for the first concert Wilhelmj gave in London. May we say it at once? Expectations were not by any means disappointed—rather, perhaps, surpassed. For an artist like Wilhelmj it cannot, it might be thought, be a difficult matter to gather a number of accomplished colleagues for his support. This is, however, not the case. It is true there are, at this time of the year, many foreign artists of great repute in England. Those, however, make their engagements for many weeks in advance. It is, therefore, not easy to obtain a powerful staff at short notice. In this respect, however, Herr Wilhelmj was lucky. Although his concert had to be organised in very short time, he was assisted by artists of acknowledged standing, and was fortunate enough to secure the services of no less admirable a pianist than Mdme Essipoff.

The concert took place at St James's Hall, on Friday evening, the 17th inst., when, despite inclement weather, a large audience was attracted, who must have been pleased to hear so interesting a novelty as Johann S. Svensden's stringed quartet in A minor. The Swedish composer is a man of distinguished talent; but we cannot pronounce a definite opinion of the merits of his quartet after a single hearing. Herr Wilhelmj is no less an admirable leader of chamber music than a brilliant solo player. Nothing more satisfactory than his reading of this quartet, and other concerted pieces—including the andante with variations from Schubert's quartet in D minor, and Schumann's trio in the same key—could be wished. In Messrs Pollitzer, Zerbini, and Daubert, Herr Wilhelmj found able coadjutors. Herr Oscar Beringer, one of the most eager prophets of the "Higher Development," gave the pianoforte part in Schumann's beautiful trio, with intelligence, spirit, and perfect mastery over its technical difficulties. A bravura piece of the most legitimate kind was selected for the solo display of the concert-giver, who, in all he does, proves himself a genuine artist, disdaining to win applause by trickery. Ernst's Airs Hongrois, with variations for violin and orchestral accompaniment, is a piece instinct with melodious charm and romantic sentiment. The variations, trying and difficult as they are, seemed child's play in the practised hands of Wilhelmj. Rarely have we listened to a more masterly exhibition of mechanical facility, rarely to a burst of applause more spontaneous and general than that which brought the great performer back to the platform, and induced him to play his own familiar "transcription" of the Romanza from Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto in E. The accompanist, as in the Airs Hongrois, was Herr Wilhelm Ganz, who in both instances showed marked ability. In conjunction with Mdme Essipoff, Herr Wilhelmj was heard in a series of charming "Feuilles d'Album," which were composed by Ernst and Stephen Heller, and published as "Pensées Fugitives," or "Gages d'Amitié." The ensemble of the two great artists was in every respect perfect. Mdme Essipoff chose for solos Chopin's Berceuse, a study by the same master, and Rubinstein's "Valse Brilliante." Nothing could surpass the delicacy with which the first-named was given, or the spirit that characterised the last. After several recalls, Mdme Essipoff acceded to the loudly expressed desire of the audience, and performed another piece—Schubert's Serenade—which she interpreted as poetically as the composer had poetically conceived it. This, too, to judge by their enthusiastic expressions of approval, the audience would only have been too pleased to hear again. The vocalists were Madlle Nita Gaëtano, and Signor Urio; the lady selecting Mozart's "Non più di fiori," and Pergolesi's "Ogni pena," the gentleman an air by Handel (encored), and Balfe's "Good night, beloved." Sir Julius Benedict conducted; and everything went off so well that very few can have left St James's Hall without regret that Wilhelmj's first concert for the season should also be his last.

SIGMUND MENKES.

FLORENCE.—Signor Leopoldo Costoli has completed the model for the statue of Rossini, which will be carried out in marble, and placed in the vestibule of the Teatro della Pergola. The arrangements for lighting the theatre with gas are nearly finished.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

It is no part of our duty to criticise what was done at the concert given by this body in the Albert Hall on Saturday evening. The occasion assumed to be of a private character—in itself a sufficient reason for not treating it as public; but apart from this, it would be unfair to judge the performance of amateurs by the high standard which is alone applicable in view of the works performed. When a non-professional orchestra attempts to play symphonies, criticism of the result is necessarily determined by the degree of merit such music exacts; wherefore it is kinder not to criticise. Considerations like these, however, do not affect the historic portion of our task, and it may be stated that in the Amateurs' programme were several works of undoubted interest. The selection began, for example, with Gounod's Symphony in D, continuing with Handel's third sonata for violin (Mr Enthoven) and pianoforte (Miss Enthoven), the overtures to Don Giovanni, Merry Wives of Windsor, and Haydée, and the Gavotte (which had to be repeated), from Thomas's Hamlet. It will be inferred from this list that the members of the orchestra have not abated one jot of confidence or ambition, and as easy is it to see that their powers were severely tested. However we look at the result, the spectacle of so many gentlemen striving to do great things in a noble cause gives satisfaction, and encourages a belief that musical life in amateur circles is sound and healthy. The vocalists were Miss Robertson and Mr Mansfield, each of whom obtained the favour of the audience—the lady carrying off exceptional honours. After "Una voce" Miss Robertson was called three times, and then compelled to repeat the air. A like result attended her in an air from Gounod's Mireille, so impressed were all present by the beauty and compass of her voice. Miss Robertson was accompanied on the piano by Signor Randegger. A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

I'm in bed, I'm in bed, with a cold in my head!
Yet the tips of my fingers do freeze;
My feet covered with blains, my back aching with pains,
And so do both shoulders and knees.
And I could not be worse—Oh! this climate's a curse!
Such language excuse if you please,
For ah! nobody knows the extent of my woes,
And how much I snuffle and sneeze.
Then, I pray, let us fly to a country that's dry,
Where the frost does not nip to the bone,
Where north winds do not blow, and they never have snow,
And colds in the head are not known.

WEST BROMWICH.

(From a Correspondent.)

The West Bromwich Choral Society may be congratulated on the success of its first concert, when some hundred-and-twenty members made their début in a series of part-songs, executed in a manner conferring credit upon the singers, and reflecting honour upon the conductor—Mr William Hartland—whose energy and perseverance have effected wonders. Scarcely three months have elapsed since the society held its first practice, and many members were altogether novices. It is needless to specify the various numbers; suffice it that Henry Smart, Henry Leslie, Pinsuti, &c., were the composers, and that one and all were rendered with due expression; the "Troubadour" being encored. The principal soloists were Miss Banks and Mr W. H. Cummings, the former being encored in "Over hill, over dale," the latter in "The Thorn," "There's nae luck aboot the house," in one instance, and "Sally in our alley" in the other, being substituted. A similar compliment was paid to Mr Larder, in "I'm a roamer" and the "Wolf." Mr Hartland, besides directing the choir, gave two pianoforte solos—Chopin's Fantaisie Impromptu and Gottschalk's Pasquinade Caprice—displaying a neat execution and refinement worthy notice. As accompanist, Miss Hartland left nothing to desire. At the next concert Arthur Sullivan's Prodigal Son will form the attraction. H. D.

UNVEILING THE BUST OF STERNDALE BENNETT.

(From the "Sheffield and Rotherham Independent," Dec. 21.)

A ceremony, simple in its form, and unostentatious as the kindly gentleman in whose memory it was performed, was witnessed yesterday in the Cutler's Hall by a numerous company. It was the unveiling of a marble bust of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, whose name will be always cherished by lovers of music, and whose distinguished career as a composer has conferred such honour on this his native town. Nine months ago, not very long after his death, a meeting was held in the School of Art to consider the desirability of erecting a memorial in Sheffield of his worth. The speakers, one and all, spoke tenderly of the great but modest musical genius who had sunk out of life, and Mr W. Smith, who has taken the greatest possible interest in the memorial, adverted to the name of Sir Sterndale Bennett in these words :—

"Life is short; art is long; and the utmost most of us can hope for is that our memory may linger amongst those who have known us during life; but the name of Sir Sterndale Bennett will be much more enduring, for it will remain to future ages, embalmed and preserved from decay by that divine art of which he was one of the chief priests; and the more that art is cultivated, the wider, the firmer, and the loftier will be his fame."

It was decided at the meeting that the memorial should take the form of a bust on a pedestal, and subscriptions were soon forthcoming. The work was entrusted to Mr L. A. Malampré, of London, and well he has carried out his trust—although he has laboured under the disadvantage of never having seen Sir Sterndale Bennett. The bust, placed on a pedestal of Sicilian marble, stands in the old dining hall, beneath the portrait of Mr Wilson Overend, that being a position which commands the best light. In the centre of the pedestal is a slab of dark yellow marble, bearing the words :—

"Sir William Sterndale Bennett, M.A., Mus. Doc., D.C.L., Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music. Born at Sheffield, April 13th, 1816; died February 1st, 1875. Interred at Westminster Abbey."

The ceremony was performed at three o'clock yesterday afternoon by Mr E. Stirling Howard. Amongst those present were the Master Cutler (Alderman Tozer), Alderman Bragge, Alderman Grundy, Mr W. Fisher, Mr W. Smith (president of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce), Mr C. Atkinson, Mr J. Hobson, Mr H. F. Crighton, Mr W. H. Brittain, Mr H. Colley, Mr W. Short, Mr Schöllhamer, and many other admirers of the late composer.

Mr Stirling Howard, after stating that they had met to unveil the bust of Sir Sterndale Bennett, gave a short history of the movement which had led to the completion of the memorial, which was not only a great credit to the town, but to the artist. They could with pride see it placed amongst the paintings and the sculpture of the eminent men around, for there it would take no unworthy place. Eminently a classical and refined composer, the works of Sir Sterndale Bennett would, he felt sure, be more appreciated in the future than they were in the present age; and he believed that, if there had been a fund in the country to enable men of great genius to employ their time in works of the highest art, the late composer, their common friend, would have left a large number of works behind to entrance the people. As it was, he was obliged to employ the greater part of his time in teaching; but here his kindly disposition crept out, and never, through all the weary hours he spent with his pupils, did he repine. Straightforward, genial, sociable, and modest withal, he was one whom they all might have been proud to call their friend. The bust was then unveiled by Mr Howard, and formally handed over to the Cutlers' Company.

Mr. W. Smith said he trusted the bust was destined to remain in the hands of the Cutlers' Company, and, in order to show how it got into their possession, he had prepared a document containing that information. It was to this effect :—

"Be it remembered that this 20th day of Dec., 1875, a marble bust and pedestal, executed by Mr L. A. Malampré, of London, was placed in the hall of the Cutlers' Company of Hallamshire, (Edward Tozer, Esq., master), to perpetuate the memory of Sir Sterndale Bennett, M.A., D.C.L., Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and a native of this town. The cost of executing this testimonial was defrayed by a subscription of some of Sir Sterndale's fellow-townsmen, whose names are here recorded :—Messrs. W. Smith (chairman of the committee and hon. sec.), Bernard Wake, Rev. Rowley Hill, W. Fisher, J. Jowitt, H. Rodgers, W. Baker, C. Smith, Mark Firth, Leader and Sons, F. T. Mappin, John Newbould, C. K. A. Chadburn, W. Bragge, W. Short, E. Firth, P. Phillips, C. Atkinson, Miss Ray, C. Harvey, Tennant Brothers, E. S. Howard, H. Stephenson, W. K. Peace, Miss M. H. Parkes, Herr Schöllhamer, G. Wilson, T. Turner & Co., A. Brooksbank, T. W. Rodgers, W. Chesterman, S. Roberts, W. G. Blake, H. J. Dixon, Thos. Jessop, John Hobson, T. R. Gainsford, E. Tozer, T. Heiffor, S. Jackson, H. Colley, and W. H. Brittain."

After reading the document, Mr. Smith handed it to the Master Cutler, with a request that he would place it in the archives of the company.

Alderman Tozer, on behalf of the Cutlers' Company, said he had great pleasure in accepting the bust, which was a beautiful specimen of work; and, referring to his personal intercourse with the late composer in connection with the mooted festival at the opening of the Albert Hall, spoke of him in the most eulogistic language. Sir Sterndale Bennett did not visit Sheffield very much during the latter part of his life, but always had a loving remembrance of the town, and he was sure that the Cutlers' Company would treasure the memorial of his worth and genius.

Alderman Bragge, in moving a vote of thanks to Mr W. Smith, chairman of the committee, said, had it not been for his (Mr Smith's) energy and perseverence in connection with the memorial they might not have had in their little but growing Pantheon this beautiful work of art, this interesting memorial of such a worthy fellow-citizen. The vote was put without any further formality, and carried with applause.

Mr W. Smith referred to the cordial response which the movement had met with, and, after thanking the gentlemen who had given him their ready help and support, congratulated the artist on the successful way in which he had carried out his work. That beautiful bust, and the excellent likeness it conveyed, would remain for generations to show through the medium of the eye what "manner of man" he was when he lived amongst them. But, after all, the greatest monument of Sir Sterndale Bennett was one more appreciable than that through the eye. It came to them through another sense. Viewed by the eye, it was simply a number of black dots and strokes, scattered in a strange, cabalistic manner over a sheet of paper; but these, when properly interpreted and taken up by the hands of the musician, appealed through the ear; and it was to that sense that Sir Sterndale Bennett would be most present to posterity. He thoroughly endorsed the remarks made by Mr Howard, that the works of Sir Sterndale Bennett would be much more widely appreciated in the future. The cause of musical education was progressing in the country; it had been introduced into our Board Schools; and before long the question as to whether England was or was not a musical country would be solved beyond all doubt. It might be said of the works of Sir Sterndale Bennett that they were destined to last all time whilst the human race existed; they would be found more enduring than tradition, and more lasting than marble. A vote of thanks, on the motion of Mr W. Smith, seconded by Mr C. Atkinson, was then passed to the Master Cutler for accepting the bust, who suitably acknowledged the vote, and the proceedings concluded with a vote of thanks to the artist.

Shortly after the bust had been unveiled, Mrs Holt, Miss Ferrier, and the Rev. J. Gabriel sang "God is a spirit," an unaccompanied quartet from The Woman of Samaria. Very sweetly they sang it; like a requiem for an old friend it came, and it seemed hard to think that he who had composed it had passed from our midst, and was lying still in death.

WHEN, some five and thirty years ago, before a select audience at Willis's Rooms, Thomas Carlyle broached his theory of Hero Worship, he did not start a new creed. Hero Worship is as old as the hills. All Carlyle did was to treat the principle as Linnæus, Humphrey Davy, or Buffon, treated a plant, a chemical element, or an animal. He gave it a fixed and definite name. Hero Worship has existed as long as man has existed. Adam was a hero, doubtless, in his own eyes. What man is not? He was more fortunate, too, than many of his descendants. He had no valet-de-chambre, no gentleman's gentleman, who could exhibit any scepticism, and call his master's semi-divinity into question. We are all Hero Worshippers. Hero Worship is not confined to one nation or one country. It is universal, and the indiscriminateness exhibited in the exercise of it must sorely vex the soul of the Philosopher of Chelsea.

Mankind are not sufficiently scrupulous about the persons whom they select as heroes, and at whose shrines they fall down and worship. Let us take a particular case. To judge from actual experience, what qualities are considered by the masses in England, especially the rising generation, to be such as entitle their possessors to a place in the Livre d'Or of Heroism? On glancing cursorily over the list, we find the names of Marlborough, Alexander the Great, Robinson Crusoe, Wellington, Nelson, Drake, Napier, Garnet Wolsley, and Frobisher; but mixed up with them, on a perfect equality, are those of Jack Sheppard, Captain Kydd, Three-Fingered Jack, Dick Turpin, Jonathan Wilde, and, though last, not least in iniquity: Clown.

It is a sad and humiliating confession, but it must be made. The juvenile members of the community—who will, in due course, as we are often, somewhat unnecessarily, reminded, furnish our future Legislators hereditary and elected, our Ministers of State, Generals, Admirals, and Judges, besides providing, as we are not so frequently informed, our future pickpockets, burglars, promoters of sham joint-stock companies, bubble financiers, and other swindlers—worship, for some weeks, or even months, at this season, every year, one Hero exclusively. That Hero is the painted reprobate we have mentioned. Why should they? And why should their Elders, instead of resolutely forbidding them to visit a theatre while Clown reigns supreme there, absolutely supply them with the means of witnessing his vagaries? As Hamlet says: That is the question. We will endeavour to answer it. Conjurors extract heaps of flowers from an ordinary hat, and Faraday used to procure for his hearers marvellous stores of knowledge from the consideration of a penny candle. Similarly, if it is allowable we may derive a useful lesson from studying the character of Clown.

"Parvis componere magna,"

In forming our estimate of this utterly abandoned and shameless representative of our national drama, we enjoy a most unusual advantage. We know him not only ab ovo, in the general acceptation of the phrase, but even at an earlier period. His existence is invariably dualistic. It is a metempsychological problem worked out before our eyes. When we first make his disreputable acquaintance he is not Clown. He is somebody else. And who is that somebody? A wicked Baron, an Ogre with dreadful proclivities towards cannibalism, a tyrannical Sovereign, a domineering Beadle, or some equally objectionable personage, whose mission and delight it is to persecute, bully, and render miserable every innocent creature with whom he comes in contact.

"Thus bad begins, and worse remains behind."

After his chrysalis state is, at length, past, and he appears with his capacious, baggy small-clothes, offensive wig, and pigeon-toed walk, Clown greets his gaping audience with the unfailing remark: "Here we are again." Besides being perfectly superfluous, for we are aware he is there again, the remark at once betrays the inherent vulgarity of his mind. Actually when addressing the public he must couch his thoughts, such as they are, in the form of trivial familiarity. Under like circumstances, Mr Fechter, in The Duke's Motto, was accustomed to say: "I am here!" How much more dignified! How much more noble! But then Mr Fechter was a man of refined and cultivated taste, while Clown is just the reverse. And what, from this point, is the career which so fascinates British youth? Alas, one long career of vice! Who ever knew Clown to do, or, as he might, with diabolical sarcasm, express it, be guilty of, a good action? Who ever knew him to suffer the slightest twinge of conscience, if merely to prove that he possesses a conscience? We do not pause for a reply, because we do not require one. No human being with the smallest germ of a conscience could behave as Clown behaves, and no human being could behave so on this side the float without a prompt introduction to the sitting magistrate at the nearest Police Court, and without subsequently being, in exchange for a fixed daily modicum of manual or pedal labour, boarded and lodged during a lengthened period of years at the public expense. Mark Mr Clown as he roams about with his tongue in his cheek and a leer in his eye. How utterly unprincipled is his conduct to every nurserymaid, or other female, if of prepossessing exterior, whom he may come across. How seductive his blandishments; how false his protestations! He is as bad as a Life-Guardsman. How cruel is his treatment of children. With what callousness he flings them out of perambulators, and smashes them flat under heavy chests of drawers. How unconcernedly he knocks off Policemen's heads, and with what carelessness he puts them on again wrong side foremost, so that his unfortunate victims are completely unfitted to go on duty any more, unless they have a Divisional Surgeon extraordinarily expert in cephalic cases. Clown's persecution of that lithe and sparkling member of society, Harlequin, as well as of Harlequin's charming partner, bewitching Columbine, is unwarrantable. His want of reverence towards old age, as exemplified in his dealings with the long suffering, and rather imbecile, Pantaloon, is revolting. The manner in which he backs out of a quarrel, too, when he meets with a determined opponent, and the alacrity with which he leaves others to settle by blows a misunderstanding he himself has caused, seem to point to the conclusion that his courage is apocryphal. He is over-fond of the maxim—

"He who fights and runs away Lives to fight another day."

That young people should be drawn towards this besmirched criminal is, perhaps, natural. They are attracted by the glare of his success, as moths are fascinated by the flame of a candle. But why, to repeat, in another shape, our second question, do their parents and guardians afford them opportunities for gratifying a taste which it is the duty of all parents and guardians to suppress? They do so on principle. They may not know this, any more than the Bourgeois Gentilhomme knew he had been talking prose all his life, but so it is. Or, to put it still more forcibly: they do so on instinct. "Instinct is a great matter," to use the words of Sir John Falstaff. They treat their offspring and young charges to see Clown, as the Lacedæmonians used to treat their juvenile Spartans to the sight of a Helot disguised in liquor, so as to instil in them a horror for drunkenness. In taking their progeny to the Pantomime, English Patresfamilias are instinctively discharging a solemn obligation. They are inculcating in the breast of young England a profound and lasting hatred of wickedness and sin, however alluring the garb in which those horrors may be presented.

Impressed by this great truth, we trust that Pantomime may long continue to flourish among us, and Clown long continue his course of immorally moral teaching. He is an indispensable factor in the ethical system of the World. And, peradventure, there may lurk somewhere about him a little spark of a better nature; latet forsitan virtutis scintilla, for we believe that, with all his faults, he is sincere when he wishes his audience, as we now wish our Readers, A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. R. K.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Wagner's Tetralogical Trilogy, at the National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre, Bayreuth, absorbs for its performance the services of no less than twelve prime donne, and eleven leading artists of the sterner sex, tenors, barytones, and basses.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The examinations for the Westmoreland Scholarship and Potter Exhibition were held on Monday, the examiners being the Principal (Professor Macfarren), Mr F. R. Cox, Mr M. Garcia, Mr H. C. Lunn, Mr Walter Macfarren, Mr Brinley Richards, Dr Steggall, and Mr A. Randegger. The results were as follows:—Westmoreland Scholarship.—Miss Marie Duval, elected; highly commended, Miss Kate Brand and Miss Rachael Jessopp. Potter Exhibition.—F. W. W. Bamfylde, elected; highly commended, T. Silver and T. A. Matthay.

A WONDERFUL STRADIUARIUS.—The eminent violin maker, Herr Thomas Zach, visited London a few weeks ago with a splendid collection of old Italian violins; several Guadanini's, Amati's, Ruggi's, and one Stradiuarius—the finest instrument, perhaps, of its kind in Europe. This violin has been with an old family in Italy for nearly a hundred years, without being played upon, and is in the same condition as when it came from the great maker's hands, in 1715. The unique instrument has been purchased by a Greek amateur, Mr Casavedi, at a very high price. Several connoiseurs—for example, Herr Wilhelmj, Messrs Hill, Withers, Laurie, and others—have given their estimate of this rare article de vertû.

LETTERS expressive of surprise, regret, and disapprobation pour in upon us from all sides, provoked by the decision of the Finance Committee, ratified by the Town Council, to refuse Mr Best the extra amount which was proposed to be granted for the improvement of the programme slips given away at his organ performances. The amount at stake must be very small, but the principle is evidently of great concern to many of the public; and it is not easy to avoid the conclusion that the Town Council has made a signal mistake. The pleasure afforded to persons who ignorantly listen to fine music is as nothing compared with that which is enjoyed by those who hear it intelligently, and when the intelligence of ordinary listeners is helped by comments which elaborate the beauties of the compositions played, while at the same time they give information as to the author and his aims and his general characteristics, many ideas are added to the general stock, and, on other points besides musical merit, useful and interesting information is conveyed. Why for so small a saving the Finance Committee should curb Mr Best's zeal and hamper his efficiency and usefulness we cannot imagine. There are many fine organists who are incapable of such literary neatness and tact as the preparation of these little programmes requires. In Mr Best we have not only an organist of unsurpassed brilliancy and erudition, but a man of general culture and taste, the energies and fertility of whose pen ought not to be checked by penny wise considerations so long as they are judiciously exercised for the instruction of the public.—Liverpool Dragon.

PETER PINDAR once sent the following lines to Shield, the composer, for the loan of his ivory ticket of admission to a concert:—

"Son of the String (I do not mean Jack Ketch, Though Jack, like thee, produces dying tones),
Oh! yield thy pity to a starving wretch,
And, for to-morrow's treat, pray send thy bones."

The lines are distinguished neither for particularly fine wit nor particularly fine feeling, and are more adapted to the taste of the past generation than to that of the present.

Lohengrin was first produced at Vienna on the 19th August, 1858. Since then it has been performed there 114 times. The following is a list of the actors who have successively sustained the principal parts: Heinrich der Vogler—Herren Schmid, Mayerhofer, Hablawetz, Rokitansky, Scaria; Lohengrin—Herren Ander, Walter, Grimminger, Adams, Niemann, Müller, Labatt, Jäger; Elsa—Mesdes Dustmann, Krauss, Harriers-Wippern, Zimmermann, Bosse, Ehnn, Löwe, Breifeld, Mallinger, Kupfer-Berger; Telramund—Herren Beck, Rudolf, Halraneck, de Vignio, Krauss, Betz, Schaffganz, Degele; Ortrud—Mesdes Csillag, Ellenger, Sulzer, Destinn, Wilt, Materna, Singer Brandt, Jaide.

To H. Peters, Esq.

SIR,—I read the subjoined in the Illminster Period:—

"PARISH—BEADLE—On the 8th inst., at L'Eglise Le Temple, Neuchatel, Alfred Parish, Esq., of Erith, to Kate Martha youngest daughter of the late Charles Beadle, Esq., also of Erith, Kent."

This extraordinary Parish Beadle marriage, although thrashing my understanding, might interest Farmer Point. The motto of the young couple should be, "United we sit." Yours, humbly, CUNNING'M GRIST (M. D.).

[Dr Grist ought to understand that it involves simply a question of Beadle and Beadle on one side, and of Parish and Parish on the other. His near relative, Verdant Green, who buys so many copies, at various prices, of a song which he disapproves, could have told him that much. Farmer Point has long since been gathered to his fathers—all Points.—D. P.]

MADAME ANNETTE ESSIPOFF, after playing in a concert at Hastings on Monday, left England for Paris, where she is to appear at one of the concerts of M. Pasdeloup. She afterwards has a tour in Germany, and (we are only too glad to hear) returns to us in April, to play again at the Monday Popular Concerts, &c.

MR VERNON RIGBY, who has been compelled to give up all engagements for some time past, on account of severe indisposition, has now—our readers will be glad to know—quite recovered.

MDLLE MARIE KREBS and Signor Piatti are to appear at the next Monday Popular Concert—on Jan. 10th.

CREDAT JUDÆUS.—The largest sum ever offered to an artiste for a single occasion of the exercise of her powers has recently tempted in vain Mdlle Tietjens. She was offered the sum of £1,000 to sing five songs at a special concert organized for the purpose of hearing her. Mdlle Tietjens was obliged to decline. Her health is, however, now quite restored. She sang last week at Baltimore, Harrisburg, and Cincinnati, to enthusiastic crowds (at how much a song?).—Daily Papers.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

A PERFORMANCE of the Messiah was given at Tolmer's Square Church, Hampstead Road, by Mr T. Pettit's choral society, assisted by Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Alice Barnett, Mr H. Guy, and Mr Wadmore. The choruses—"For unto us," and "The Lord gave the word"—were sung with great precision. The solo vocalists were much applauded. Mr. T. Mountain presided most efficiently at the organ, and Mr T. Pettit conducted.

THE first concert this season given by the St Matthew's Choral Society, Brixton, took place on Tuesday evening, the 14th inst., at the Schools, Church Road, Brixton, under the conductorship of Mr George Shinn (organist of St Matthew's Church). The programme was of a miscellaneous character, and consisted of choruses and part-songs for the choir, solos for Miss Mary Davies, Signor Rizzelli, and Mr S. Crome, and two trios executed by Mr Michael Henry (violin), Mr H. A. Hawkins (violoncello), and Mr George Shinn (pianoforte). Mr S. Fisher was the pianoforte accompanist, Mr J. B. Gaunt presiding at the harmonium.

A CONCERT took place in the Church Room, St Mark's, North Audley Street, under the direction of Mr A. D. Miles, the Organist, being the third of the winter series of entertaiments. The vocalists were Miss Marie Duval, Miss Joyce Maas, Mr W. A. Howells, and Mr Thurley Beale. Mr Arthur Cecil's song, "I hear thee speak of a better land," was charmingly sung by Miss Duval; Miss Maas was greatly applauded for her rendering of Sullivan's, "Let me dream again," and Mr Thurley Beale was very successful in a new song, "The Gladiator," by Mr C. E. Tinney, accompanied by the composer. Alice Mary Smith's duet, "Maying" (Miss Duval and Mr Howells), and Macfarren's Trio, the "Troubadour" were well received. The programme included violin and flute solos by Mr F. B. Smythies and Mr Miller. Pianoforte solos and duets were given by Mr H. A. Branscombe and Mr A. D. Miles. The attendance was good, and the whole performance gave the greatest satisfaction.

MR GEORGE RUSSELL gave his annual concert, at Croydon, with his usual deserved success. The Demoiselles Badia and Mr William Shakespeare were the vocalists, and Mr George Russell, Mr Henry Holmes, and M. Paque the instrumentalists. The following is the programme:—Grand trio in D minor—Mendelssohn; aria, "Un aura amorosa" (Cosi fan tutte)—Mozart; scherzo, "Midsummer Night's Dream"—Mendelssohn; duetto, "Maria Padilla"—Donizetti; romance in F (violin)—Beethoven; trio in A major (MS.)—G. Russell; song, "If fondest wishes"—G. Russell; duo, "Per Valli"—Biangini; solo (violoncello), "Caprice Hongrois"—Paque; aria, "Spirto gentil"—Donizetti; solos (pianoforte), Nocturne in A flat, Chopin, and Spinnlied—Litolff. All the foregoing pieces are well known, but Mr Russell's trio may be new to many of our readers, although its accomplished composer has, we think, played it on a previous occasion at Croydon. With regard to the instrumental performances, the Croydon Advertiser says:—"The solos were on a par of excellence with the concerted pieces. Mr Holmes has made Beethoven's charming romance completely his own; it seems, as it were, to be a part of him, and he certainly nowhere more fully proclaims himself the finished artist. The animated 'Caprice Hongrois' was received, as on a previous occasion, with the greatest enthusiasm. It is quite a cheval de bataille for M. Paque. Mr Russell's powers are too well-known to our readers to need lengthened comment. Suffice it that, whether in the intricacies of Mendelssohn's Scherzo, in the pathos and passion of Chopin's lovely Nocturne, or in the restless arpeggios of the Spinnlied, we never heard him do himself greater justice." The vocalists were received with great favour; the Misses Badia won "encores" and golden opinions by their charming duet-singing; and Mr Shakespeare met with a success that must have highly gratified the young tenor. The concert altogether gave general satisfaction.

TO DR TAYLOR SHOE.

DEAR SHOE,—I enclose a small original poem, but don't know whether it is worth insertion in the New Year's number. Was it of Dr Brandies that Aug. Mayhew said, on seeing the Doctor eat a small piece of lemon-peel after smoking: "Then I inwardly exclaimed, The paths of the virtuous are as pleasing as dividends, but lemon-peel shall not cloak the breath of the vicious; the smell of smoke shall cling unto him like a burr"? O, by Abbs!—what Doctors last week, and O, by Adnam!—what Wraiths.

SIMPLER SEMPLE MIDGE.

[No, it was of Dr Schnaps. Dr Brandies is gathered to his grandmothers.—S. T. SHOE.]

STRALSUND.—Handel's Samson was lately performed by Dornheckter's Vocal Association.

PROVINCIAL.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—A most successful society has lately been started here under the title of the "Newcastle Amateur Vocal Society," with Hilton Philipson Esq., as President; John Pattison, Esq., as Vice-president, and Wm. Rea, Esq., conductor. Mr R. B. Brentnall is the Hon. Secretary. The society has taken up Cherubini's Requiem (in C minor), and G. A. Macfarren's May Day for practice.

LIVERPOOL.—The private choir organised by Mr J. J. Monk, gave a miscellaneous concert on Thursday evening the 16th inst, at Hope Hall. Mr Monk—says the Daily Mercury—is fast establishing a reputation both as a composer and an executant, and his efforts to infuse a musical taste amongst the class within his own range is being rapidly rewarded with success. His private choir, composed for the most part of his own pupils, produced for the first time in Liverpool, Mendelssohn's operetta Son and Stranger. The work abounds with beautiful melody and true Mendelssohnian harmony, the transitions affording no easy work for the amateur vocalists. There was a lack of vivacity in the execution of the choruses, but the solos were very creditably sung. Not the least interesting portion of the evening's entertainment was the performance of some of Mr Monk's own works, and Sullivan's Trial by Jury, which concluded the concert. Mrs Connell presided at the pianoforte, Mr E. T. Driffield at the harmonium, and Mr Monk was the conductor.

UXBRIDGE.—The first concert of the Uxbridge Choral Society for the present season, was given at the Public Rooms, and was a complete success from a musical point of view; but we fear it was hardly a financial success, for, although the reserved seats were pretty well occupied, the second seats and gallery were by no means full. The chorus has improved, both in tone and in confidence, since their last appearance in public, and the music allotted to them was gone through with scarcely a hitch. In praising the members of the choir—says a local journal—we must not omit to point out how much they are indebted to their conductor, Mr Miles; for, however good the material, the efficiency of the class as a whole depends, in a very great measure, on that of the instructor. The solo singers were Miss Jessie Jones and Mr W. Shakespeare, who is fast creating for himself a reputation as a tenor. He sang faultlessly a new song, "Chi è?" by Mr Walter Austin, and, creating quite a furore, the audience would not be satisfied without its repetition. Mr Lewis Thomas was the basso, and his rendering of "Honour and Arms" was indeed a treat. He was still more appreciated in "Largo al factotum," which he gave with all the volubility and animation due to the "Barber." This was encored, as well as Randegger's trio, "I naviganti," which richly deserved it, being sung with true artistic feeling.

HUDDERSFIELD.—One of the most successful concerts ever given by the Huddersfield Choral Society took place in the Armoury, Ramsden Street, when Handel's Messiah was performed. This was the 160th concert of the society since its formation, and the Armoury could not well have been better filled. The orchestra and vocalists—the former number forty-eight—included representatives from the orchestras of Mr Hallé and Mr De Jong, and the latter over 160. The concert passed off without a hitch, and for this the credit is due to a great extent to Mr Joshua Marshall, the conductor, who, at the commencement, was presented with a splendid ivory gold-mounted bâton, in morocco case with blue silk lining, by Mr J. J. Grist, the senior vice-president, on behalf of the committee. Of Mdlle Jose Sherrington, so much has been written and said in praise of her vocal powers that nothing we might say can enhance her reputation, but to listen to "I know that my Redeemer liveth," rendered with exquisite taste, was a treat seldom experienced. Throughout the evening she sustained her voice with the greatest apparent ease in the most telling airs and recitatives, and gained the warmest applause. Miss Fairman ingratiated herself in the favour of her auditors, more especially by the pathos with which she gave "He was despised." Mr Lloyd has now attained a degree of popularity in Huddersfield that has made him quite a favourite. Of Mr Rickard we have often spoke in the highest terms. His voice was heard to advantage in "Why do the nations?" and the "Trumpet shall sound." The chorus was extremely well balanced, and the instrumentalists—specially noticeable in the "Pastoral symphony"—perfect.

TEIGNMOUTH.—Madame Liebhart and her talented party gave an evening concert in the New Assembly Rooms, Bank Street. Mdme Liebhart is universally acknowledged to be an artist of the highest reputation. Her singing of the grand aria in Der Freischütz, "Leise, leise," is so well known that it is only necessary to say that it was in her best manner. The ballad, "Little bird so sweetly singing," accompanied by Mr R. Blagrove on the concertina, still further exhibited the capabilities of Madame Liebhart's voice, especially in the cadenzas, where the voice and concertina revelled together in shakes, turns, and all kinds of airy ornamental passages. This was re-demanded. For her last song Madame Liebhart gave the favourite Scotch ballad, "Within a mile of Edinburgh town," which met with hearty applause. Miss Marian Severn was much admired in the "Drummer's Song," composed by Madame Sainton-Dolby, and in that very pretty duet of Blangini, "Per valli per boschi," in which Mr Henry Guy joined, but most of all in the ballad, "She wore a wreath of roses." This was encored and repeated. Mr Henry Guy, who had already been heard and admired in Teignmouth, confirmed the favourable impression he had created on his first visit. The duet for concertino and piano was an unusual treat. When we add that Mr Richard Blagrove holds the position of the first concertina player of the day, and that Mrs Blagrove is a well-known and favourite pianist, it can easily be imagined how beautifully their duets were executed. Miss Hincks played Thalberg's fantasia on Lucrezia Borgia and the "Moto continuo" of Weber. The concert, in an artistic sense, was an undoubted success, but we regret to say (owing to the bad weather) the speculation was anything but remunerative.

MUSICAL MUTUAL PROTECTIVE UNION.

RULES OF ORDER.

SECT. 1.—The President having taken the chair, and called the meeting to order, the business shall be conducted as follows:—(a) Calling the roll of officers. (b) Reading minutes of the last regular and special meeting. (c) Report of the Executive Committee. (d) Reports of Treasurer, Trustees, and Secretary. (e) Reports of Special Committees. (f) Communications. (g) Unfinished business. (h) New business.

SECT. 2.—No question shall be entertained unless moved by two members, nor open for consideration until stated by the Chair.

SECT. 3.—When a question is before the meeting, no motion shall be received, except to adjourn, to lay on the table, commit the previous question, to postpone to a particular time, to postpone indefinitely, to amend; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are named; the first four to be decided without debate.

SECT. 4.—When a question has been postponed indefinitely, it shall not be acted upon again unless by a two-third vote.

SECT. 5.—When a blank is to be filled, the question shall be first taken on the highest sum or number, or the longest time proposed.

SECT. 6.—Any two members may call for a division of a question, when the sense will admit of it, before a decision is rendered.

SECT. 7.—The yeas and nays may be called for by five members, when all qualified members present shall vote, unless excused by a three-fourth vote.

SECT. 8.—After a question (except one indefinitely postponed) has been decided, two members who voted with the majority may, at the same or next meeting, move for a reconsideration; but no discussion of the main question shall be allowed, unless reconsidered. A motion to reconsider the question a second time shall not be entertained.

SECT. 9.—All questions not otherwise provided for, shall be determined by majority vote.

SECT. 10.—When a member intends to speak on a question, he shall rise, address the Chair, confine himself to the question, and avoid personalities. Should more than one rise at the same time, the President shall decide who is entitled to the floor.

SECT. 11.—No member shall speak more than twice on the same question, or more than once until all others have had an opportunity, nor more than five minutes, unless by special permission of the President.

SECT. 12.—The President, while presiding, shall state every question coming before the meeting, and immediately before putting it to vote shall ask—"Is the meeting ready for the question?" Should no member rise to speak, he shall rise to state the question, and after he has risen, no member shall speak upon it unless by consent of the President. He shall pronounce the votes and decisions of the meeting on all subjects. When his decision has been appealed from, the question shall be stated thus: "Will the meeting stand by the Chair in its decision?" Which appeal must be decided without debate.

SECT. 13.—A member may be called to order while speaking, when the debate must be suspended, and the member take his seat until the question of order is decided.

SECT. 14.—The President may speak to points of order in preference to others, and shall decide questions of order. Any member may appeal to the meeting, which appeal must be decided without debate, and the objectionable words shall, if required, be taken down in writing.

SECT. 15.—After a motion or resolution has been stated by the Chair, or read by the Secretary, it may be withdrawn before a decision of amendment by consent of the meeting. An amendment to a motion under consideration must be accepted by the meeting or by the mover of said motion before it is embodied in the original.

SECT. 16.—Every motion shall be reduced to writing, should the Chair or Secretary so desire it.

SECT. 17.—An amendment to an amendment is in order, but none further.

SECT. 18.—No question shall be put or a vote taken while a member is speaking.

SECT. 19.—All Special Committes to be appointed by the Chair, unless otherwise ordered or provided for.

SECT. 20.—No other business can be transacted at a special meeting except that set forth in the call.

SECT. 21.—All reports of Special or Standing Committees must be made in writing to the meeting, unless otherwise ordered.

SECT. 22.—All rules of order not herein provided shall be governed by parliamentary usages.

SECT. 23.—Any of these rules may be added to, altered, repealed, or suspended, at any regular or special meeting of the members, by a majority vote of two-thirds of the members present.

MR BEST AND HIS PROGRAMMES.

(To the Editor of the "Daily Post.")

SIR,—The value of annotations in programmes has of late years been so generally recognized that the resolution of the Liverpool Finance Committee with regard to those initiated by Mr Best will not raise the judgment and taste of the Corporation of Liverpool in public estimation. In artistic circles it will afford another instance of the contempt of art, especially musical art, which distinguishes most municipal bodies, and it is certainly an insult to by far the greatest organist of the day. Your correspondent "Bourdon" writes to attribute the shabby proceeding of the committee to an annotation which appeared in the organ programme of Saturday afternoon, October 10th; and, in the course of his remarks, argues that an amateur is more likely to get up and conduct efficiently a good church service than a professional man, who, he insinuates, too often looks upon his church engagement as a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence. His argument, such as it is, falls to the ground when these "persons of other pursuits" receive payment, as they do in Liverpool, and may, therefore, with equal justice, be accused of undertaking church engagements for pounds, shillings, and pence. Such persons are of a hybrid genus; they cannot properly be styled "amateurs," and yet they are not "professors." In fact, "Bourdon's" reasoning entails the conclusion that a person who has been educated for a profession, and devotes himself entirely to it, knows less about it than an individual who picks up his knowledge in the few hours he chooses to spare from business and pleasure.

The working of the system to which Mr Best alludes is exemplified by the small repute of the church services in Liverpool. It would facilitate comparison with other towns if the musical services of the two parish churches, St Nicholas' and St Peter's, were recorded in the lists published in Concordia and the Musical Standard. Hitherto, Liverpool has been conspicuous by the omission of all notices of the musical proceedings of any of its churches. Are they worthy of being chronicled?—Yours, &c., SCRUTATOR.

LEGHORN.—Lauro Rossi's Contessa di Mons, will be performed at the Teatro Rossini in the winter season. The other principal works will be La Forza del Destino and I Lombardi.

WEIMAR.—The first performance of Rosamunde und der Untergang des Gepidenreichs, libretto by W. Fellechner, music by Richard Metzdorff, took place on the 25th inst., at the Grand-Ducal Theatre.

An Angel from Heaven.

Several cases of revolting cruelty to trapped game and small birds having recently come under the notice of the Christchurch and Ringwood magistrates, the chairman of the Avon and Stour Farmer's Club, who is a local J.P., brought the matter under the notice of the club on the 1st inst., and a resolution was passed pledging the members to prosecute to conviction every case of trespass coming under their notice. The cruelty consisted mainly in plucking wings and feathers of the birds while alive, the men in their defence stating that, for certain purposes, the feathers were more valuable when so plucked, on account of their retaining the brightness of their hues. The secretary received the following letter from Lady Burdett Coutts, who is at present a guest of the Earl of Malmesbury, at Heron Court:

"To the Secretary of the Vales of Avon and Stour Farmers' Club.

"SIR—Please convey to the members of your excellent society the sense of pleasure it gave me to learn that there was a unanimous desire on their part to put down the cruelty which has been practised in this and other districts in wantonly killing and (as I learn from the Christchurch papers of the 10th inst.) actually torturing small birds. That three men should be charged with plucking the wings and feathers of a number of these most harmless of God's creatures while still alive would almost seem incredible at the present day; but if, as I am told, the destination of these feathers is the adornment of female wearing apparel, it is nearly time the sense of Englishwomen were quickened to the enormity of the crime. I have already communicated with many of the leaders of fashion in this country on the subject, and I learn that an effort will be made to have the present fashions as much as possible discarded. The public ventilation of the subject will, I am sure, do good, and I am glad to see that the leading journals have not been slow to hold up to execration the present practice. Madame Louise has assured me that it had its origin in France, and that, repugnant and absurd as the style is, there is an increasing demand for it here. English ladies will, however, incur a serious stigma for cruelty unless they discard a practice which common sense must tell them is attended with so much torture to its innocent victims. "E. BURDETT COUTTS.

TO EPHRAIM BULLOCK, ESQ.

SIR,—I beg to call your attention to the subjoined:—

"The Prince expressed his regret that he could not visit Travancore. The Maharajah seemed much pleased."

I thought that Farmers Point and Square should know what queer manners the Maharajahs have in general. A musicseller in Oxford Street evidently expected a visit from these distinguished agriculturists (so well known at Fuggle's), for, in "Cattle Show Week," that musicseller had the "Ox Minuet" of Haydn in his window, illustrated.

WAIFS.

Miss Amy Sedgwick purposes re-appearing upon the stage.

Mr Irving will, it is said, shortly play Faust at the Lyceum.

A new one-act piece by M. Vibert, Le Verglas, is being rehearsed at the Vaudeville.

Mr Barry Sullivan will play in New York next May, returning, the following month, to England.

An appeal is made for the relief of the widow and children of the last remaining son of Theodore Hook, who died in poor circumstances.

Mr Theodore Thomas, of New York, has accepted the position of musical director at the opening ceremonies of the American Centennial Exhibition.

We regret to announce the death, on the 10th inst., of Mr James Yeowell, for upwards of twenty years the active and intelligent subeditor of Notes and Queries.

A brilliant representation has been given at the Salle Ventadour for the benefit of Edouard Plouvier, the dramatic writer. It produced a gross sum of 10,000 francs.

A performance of the Messiah is to be given at the Royal Albert Hall on Christmas Day. Mdlle Albani and Mr Sims Reeves are to sing. The orchestra and chorus will number 800.

Mr Henry Fisher, of Blackpool, whose name appears among the Bachelors of Music at the recent examination at Cambridge, is a member of the Council of the Tonic Sol-fa College.

A little girl was asked what was the meaning of the word "happy." She gave a pretty answer saying, "It is to [illegible] as if you wanted to give all your things to your little sister."

The Cluny has revived an old drama by Mallefille, Les Enfants Blancs. The attraction of the piece was not sufficient, the first night of the performance, to fill even half of the house.

There is a report that Wells College, at Aurora, Illinois, has been presented with two pieces of sculpture, the work of Canova—one a marble bust of Napoleon I., the other a bust of Marie Louise.

Miss Jessie Morison, the young and clever pianist, pupil of Mr W. H. Holmes, played with great success at the Alexandra Palace concert, last week, Sir Julius Benedict's "Where the bee sucks."

An Ohio woman lately travelled with one ticket, four trunks, two band-boxes, a flower-pot, poodle dog, umbrella, jug of milk, lunch basket, paper sack full of peaches, and a boy of fifteen, whose age she gave as nine.

Mr Charles Morton will re-open the Opéra-Comique on the 13th of January, when he will produce, for the first time in this country, Offenbach's opera bouffe, Madame L'Archiduc, in which Miss Emily Soldene will appear as Marietta.

Four concerts are to be given by Mr Henry Leslie's choir after Christmas. Mr Leslie will also conduct a series of performances at St James's Hall, of which "Gems from the Oratorios," sung by Mr Sims Reeves and other artists, will constitute a feature.

The inauguration of day performances at the Renaissance Theatre has proved a success. Among the audience at the first performance were the Princess Mathilde, Prince Galitzin, MM. Legouvé, Camille Doucet, Edouard Thierry, Regnier, Delaunay, and Lafontaine.

An Iowa editor recently eloped with the wife of one of his subscribers, and was frightened half to death by the appearance of the injured man at the hotel of a neighbouring town, to which he had taken his flight. But the husband only wanted his paper stopped—that was all.

Mr. Horton C. Allison has just been unanimously elected successor to the late Mr. C. A. Seymour, as examiner for Manchester to the Royal Academy of Music, by the committee of that college. Mr. Allison was a first prizeman of the Leipsic Conservatoire, and is an Associate of the Royal Academy of Music.

Sig. Merelli has published his programme for the season of the Italian Opera in Vienna. The principal artists engaged are Mdmes Patti, Lucca, MM. Nicolini, Capoul, Padilla, and Zucchini. He will bring out Verdi's Don Carlos and Gounod's Mireille, both of which are unknown in the Austrian capital.

Several of the Paris journals complain of the dilapidated state of the tombs of Molière and La Fontaine, in the cemetery of Père-La Chaise, and refer to the letter which M. Wallon (Fine Arts) wrote a year ago to his subordinates, calling attention to the condition of the two erections. Since that period nothing has been done.

The Philadelphia Press states that a member of the Society of Friends thus complimented one of his sect who had joined a regular church upon the new organ in the latter. "Why, I thought thee objected to such things as music in worship?" "And so I do," was the reply; "but if thee must worship God by machinery I want thee to have the best."

An American paper informs us that Mad. Zaré Thalberg was offered $100,000 to sing "Yankee Doodle," at one of Messrs. Ullman and Palmer's concerts, on the Mississippi. Mr Ullman was anxious to give one million and a half of dollars; but as Dr Hans von Bülow only receives $2,000,000,000 for each performance, Dr Palmer is said to have objected.—DR BLIDGE.

A special meeting of the Stratford-on-Avon Town Council has been held, for the purpose of sanctioning an application from the secretary of the Royal Academy of Arts for the loan, for the Exhibition of Works of Old Masters and Deceased British Artists, 1876, of Gainsborough's picture of David Garrick, of which the Corporation are owners. The picture is a most valuable one, being worth several thousand pounds.

CHANGE OF NAME.—The following announcement appeared in the Gazette of Friday:—"Whitehall, Dec. 14.—The Queen has been graciously pleased to give and grant unto Edward Levy, of Norfolk Street, Park Lane, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, her royal licence and authority that he and his issue may, in compliance with a certain deed of settlement, dated the 27th day of November last, executed by his uncle, Lionel Lawson, of Brook Street, Hanover Square, in the said county of Middlesex, gentleman, take and henceforth use the surname of Lawson in addition to that of Levy; and to command that the said royal concession and declaration be recorded in Her Majesty's College of Arms, otherwise to be void and of none effect."

Here is the latest description of a kiss: "'Twas night. A real warm couple stood in the [illegible]e, cold moonbeams. Their lips touched, and there was a sound-[illegible] cow hauling her hoof out of the mud."

The next edition of the Poet Laureate's works will, it is stated, be annotated, with some help from Mr Tennyson and from many of his admirers, by Mr C. Kegan Paul. It is intended that the notes shall explain the obscure passages in Mr Tennyson's writings, and make clear the botanical and other scientific allusions in which they abound, as well as indicate the various sources from which much of his inspiration has been derived.

Madame Liebhart's morning concert at Torquay took place at the Bath Saloon, and was numerously attended by the gentry and visitors to the town and neighbourhood. The artists by whom she was assisted were, Miss Marian Severn, Mr Henry Guy, Mr Seymour Smith, Mrs Richard Blagrove, Miss Hincks, and Mr Richard Blagrove. Mr Croydon deserves much credit for providing the public with such a first-class entertainment.—Torquay Director.

In recognition of his past services, a purse containing one hundred pounds has just been presented by the Guild of Literature and art to Mr Richard H. Horne, one of its founders. It may be necessary to remind the present generation that Mr Horne is one of the few survivors of that band of famous amateurs who appeared at Devonshire House in Bulwer Lytton's comedy of Not so Bad as we seem, on behalf of the embryo guild. Lord Lytton, Dickens, Douglas Jerrold, John Leech, and Maclise, were among the distinguished authors and artists who took part in the performance.

A rare and valuable book has just been sold at the Hôtel Drouot. It is a missal, on vellum, of Flemish origin, which had been in the family of M. de Gauvain, of Nancy, for more than a hundred years. It is enriched with twenty-three miniatures—five small and eighteen large. The former represent the four Evangelists, and Jesus taken from the tomb by angels. The eighteen others, with their borders, fill the whole page, and some of them have numerous figures, one as many as fourteen. This precious manuscript was put up at 10,000 francs, and in a few minutes was bought for 20,000 francs by M. Labitte, who was said to be acting for the Duc d'Aumale.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—During the ensuing week the successful pantomime, Harlequin the Yellow Dwarf; or, the King of the Gold Mines, embracing Mr. George Conquest's marvellous feats, will be performed daily. In addition to the daily performances by Romah, the great athlete, and Miss Anderson, in her light and dark scances, Adonis, the miniature man, from the Cape of Good Hope, will hold his drawing-room receptions, and an exhibition of dolls and dolls' houses, under the patronage of the Duchess and Duke of Teck, will take place. The orchestral and military bands of the company will perform daily, and there will be a variety of equestrian, acrobatic, and other performances in the circus.

The Festival Overture by the conductor, Sir Julius Benedict, was welcome, and delighted equally the musician and the casual hearer. Like everything which he has written, it is very melodious and fresh; brilliant in the scoring, and highly effective throughout. More than once we felt the influence of Weber, but it was in feeling rather than in form; if we may be allowed the simile, it was as though the scent of the rose were near without the petals being in view. The orchestra was most hearty and painstaking in their performance, and seemed bent on giving the most satisfactory interpretation in their power to Sir Julius's work.—Liverpool Investigator.

DOLL SHOW AT THE ALEXANDRA PALACE.—The exhibition of dolls and dolls' houses, originated by Messrs Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, in conjunction with the Alexandra Palace Company, and patronised by H.R.H. the Duchess and H.S.H. the Duke of Teck, will commence on Monday, the 27th inst. It is one of the conditions of the show that the dresses of the dolls shall be the work of the children who exhibit them, and that they are to be afterwards distributed among the inmates of hospitals for sick children. Entries for this novel competition have been received from all parts of the United Kingdom, as well as from abroad, and upwards of 1,000 dolls will be displayed, dressed in the various costumes of the aristocracy, the middle classes, and the peasantry. The juvenile exhibitors belong to all ranks of society. Upwards of twenty prizes, ranging in value from £3 to 5s., will be awarded, by a committee of ladies, to the exhibitors of the best dressed dolls, and other prizes will be given to the manufacturers of the best dolls, and to exhibitors of the best fitted and furnished dolls' houses.

ALEXANDRIA.—A new opera, Malek Adhel, by Signor Lamberti, has been produced here, but was not very successful.

ST PETERSBURGH.—Verdi's Aida has been produced at the Italian Opera, in presence of all the Imperial family. Signor Nicolini was the hero.

THE

OF

Four Songs

COMPOSED BY

WM STERNDALE BENNETT

(OP. 47).

*No. 1.MAIDEN MINE.
2. SUNSET.
*3.DANCING LIGHTLY.
4. STAY, MY CHARMER.

Price 4s. each.

Of this Set of Songs, the first three are not strictly posthumous works, as they were printed and quite ready for publication at the time of the composer's death. The fourth existed only in Manuscript.

* Sung by Mr SHAKESPEARE at the first Monday Popular Concert of the Season, St James's Hall, on Monday, Nov. 8, 1875.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Mr Shakespeare brought forward two unknown songs by the late Sterndale Bennett, set to some graceful stanzas from the pen of Mr T. Case. Both are the genuine products of an experienced pen, instinct with that melodious charm and refinement of detail for which even the least ambitious of their composer's works are distinguished. Musicians may give preference to the first—'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer"; but the majority of the uninitiated will, we think, find most sympathy with the second—'Maiden Mine'—as unpretending and perfect a ballad as can be imagined."—Times, 10th November, 1875.

"Two charming effusions by Sterndale Bennett, recently published under the titles, 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.' Both are destined to be favourites."—Daily Telegraph, 10th November, 1875.

"Mr Shakespeare introduced two new songs by Sir Sterndale Bennett, as delicious and elegant as anything that ever fell from his pen, the titles of which are 'Dancing lightly, comes the Summer' and 'Maiden Mine.'"—Standard, 9th November, 1875.
